The Gawk, Shy, Little Schoolgirl Who Grew Up to Be So Bold and Wonderful

Might Have Got Back the Bashfulness of Her Eyes if the Mother Who Hated to Stay Home Had Heeded the Warning Signal

"I JUST hate staying at home, you know," declared the mother of seven children. "I get out of it as much as I can. I don't care how hard I work, but deliver me from that awful routine."

She is a charitable person, always doing something nice for some one, always finding some invalid who needs cheering or some poor family which needs clothes, food and money.

Clothes mean little in her life; if she has on a suit and a hat she is satisfied, although the combination may deeply wound the sensibilities of every one who looks at her.

She is the most hospitable soul. "We always keep open house," she laughs. "There may not be enough chairs, but you can sit on the floor, and we always have enough at meals for at least two extra, so come along any time you don't like what you're having at home and we'll try to fix you up."

At any time of day—and sometimes night—you see her off on her rounds of charity.

A charitable, good woman with a fine big heart and unselfish nature.

At ten, twelve, thirteen she was a gawky, shy, lanky child with scant skirts, far too short, straggly hair and no manners at all.

At fourteen she began to find herself and choose her own clothes in the height of style.

SATURDAY night finds her in her scant, too short skirt, with short, tight sleeves with bobbed waved hair, and everything about her entirely "foc".

And she pats him caressingly upon the cheek.

Not one Saturday night—all of them.

AND this is the daughter of the good, kind-hearted woman who hates to stay at home and gets out of it as much as she can.

Does she know where this girl is, what she is doing? Doesn't she care, or has she tried without success to make her go with the right kind of boys and girls?

It is this is wouldn't she have had better luck if she had stayed at home and become better acquainted with her daughter and her friends?

That wild light of freedom in the sixteen-year-old eyes was such a clear warning signal.

If it had only been noticed in time perhaps the gawky little girl would have been able to get back that charming shyness in her eyes.

But it's too late now.
