VOLSTEAD DROUGHT PROVES UNPOPULAR IN PHILA. ZOO

Monkeys Can't Get "Wee Nip" to Cure Sniffles and Other Zoological Topers Must Use Weak Tea

When a monkey has a cold in his head, does he get a mustard plaster or a shot of something warm and prohibited?

Well, he always used to take the internal cure until Mr. Volstead came along, and thereby hangs a tale.

C. Emerson Brown, superintendent of the Zoo, says prohibition has caused his pets acute discomfort and ruined one of their chief pleasures.

"If a monkey got the well-known sniffles in the old days," said Mr. Brown, "we would dilute some whisky, add a dash of sugar and give the animal several spoonfuls. The old remedy generally worked wonders; and what was most important, the monkey enjoyed it. But can you imagine trying to force a dose of sage tea or hot lemonade down his throat? Why, he just refuses to take it.

Even Ostrich Liked It

"One time we received an ostrich from California that looked dead when we got him here. He had his head trailing mournfully in the dust and wouldn't eat or drink. We mixed him a not-too-strong whisky drink, pried his mouth open and forced it down. He got better right away, and although I wouldn't want to swear it was the whisky, it certainly looked that way.

"Some animals appear to like strong drinks as much as some men, and alcohol acts on them about as it does on human beings. A monkey was given to us not long ago which had been a mascot for an American regiment in the war. The boys had all seen to it that he was treated to French wine whenever he felt the desire, and had completely spoiled him.

"As a result, he craved 'something hard' when he came here, and although he is living, in apparently good health, he doesn't seem entirely happy in the enforced drought. In fact, when first deprived of his favorite tipple he behaved generally like a 'bad monkey.'"

Mr. Brown incidentally disagrees with a theory that monkeys have suffered by too much education. A story from New York telling of the death of the ten days old baby of Suzette, a chimpanzee in the Bronx Zoo, because the mother could not feed it, was shown to the superintendent here.

Thrive on Stage Life

The dispatch said intellectual pursuits on the vaudeville stage, cigarette smoking, bicycle riding and beer drinking had ruined the mother's parental instinct, but Mr. Brown does not put much stock in the yarn.

"I have generally found," said Mr. Brown, "that animals of any kind traveling around a vaudeville circuit or with a circus get along better and live more happily together than they do in zoos. Perhaps it is the excitement which keeps them buoyed up.

"And I have never noticed that it had a harmful effect on their ability to raise young."
