In the other corner Georges Carpentier, the challenger, lighter and far less formidable-looking in physical aspect, yet the only European boxer in four generations who has earned the right to be considered a worthy rival of America's best. Carpentier, light-haired and blue-eyed, has only a pair of legs and a brace of fists that compare with the champion's in bulk and power, but in one there lies speed and in the other sufficient power to have left all European rivals strung out in a battered row in the wake of his advance. On the one side, Carpentier is the most dangerous man Dempsey has ever met, not so rugged as Willard or Brennan, but the only one who combines speed, punching power, ring general-ship and experience to a marked degree. These are four of the five main qualifications for the fighting game. The other, stamina, or ability to take a wallop and still move forward, has yet to be proved in the Frenchman's case.

Champion Favorite on Odds On the other side, Dempsey is far and away the best man that Carpentier ever faced, an opponent who has all five of the main qualifications, and who in at least three of the five is superior to his opponent. Therefore, Dempsey is the odds-on favorite to win, despite proclamation of European experts that the French wonder has been greatly has elected to do the most important part of his training under the cover of secrecy, leaving the observer in bewildered doubt as to what hidden forces he may throw into action when forces he may throw into action when the bell rings and the eight-ounce gloves begin their merry tattoo upon aboulders, arms, body and jaw.
