DREAMLAND ADVENTURES

Flitting With the Fairies

By DADDY

CHAPTER I
Airplanes to the Rescue

JOYOUS music filled Twinkling Isle. It was made by the birds singing gleefully to celebrate the driving away of the swamp pirates.

The swamp pirates had fled far out to sea. They couldn't stand smoke, and Billy's smudge had overcome them just when they were sure of victory. On top of this had come the grass fire, set by brands in the hands of the monkeys, and this fire had forced the pirates from their usual snug hiding holes, and the only place they had to go was out on the open ocean.

The birds sang gladly because now their friends, the tiny fairies with dragon-fly wings, no longer need fear. The fairies could return to the shores of the bay to play and dance as they had played and danced when Peggy, Billy, Folly Wisher and the African girl and her brave young husband had first come to the deserted isle.

"Come back! Come back, sweet fairies!" sang the birds. "Come back! Your human friends have made choking clouds, and the cluds have driven the evil swamp pirates far away!"

The song was passed along from bird to bird, speeding as fast as a telegraph message. It went over the hills, across the plains and down into a dark cave hidden deep in the earth. In that dark cave were huddled the tiny fairies, keeping very quiet and not daring to stir for fear the swamp pirates might hear them and come to harm them.

"Come back! The swamp pirates are gone! Peggy and Billy have driven them away. Come, hold a jubilee!"

The tiny fairies heard the song and thrilled with joy. Out of the cave they flitted to see if the swamp pirates were really gone. And when the fairies saw the island was free of their foes, they danced through the air as though half crazy with gladness.

Peggy and Billy danced, too, but not having wings they couldn't dance so airily as the fairies.

"Oh, I wish we were as tiny as the fairies and could dance as they do," cried Peggy.

Instantly Peggy and Billy vanished from the sight of Folly Wisher and the two African savages. One moment they were there and the next—poof! They were no more visible than a puff of wind.

Where had they gone? Peggy and Billy scarcely knew themselves. They found themselves suddenly in the midst of a wild jungle. In this jungle were creatures with many legs—creatures so fierce-looking that Peggy and Billy climbed quickly up a tall green trunk that stood near.

But one of the creatures saw them. It started after them up the tall trunk. Other creatures joined in the chase. In an instant Peggy and Billy found themselves being hunted as dogs hunt coons.

Billy boosted Peggy up the tall trunk, faster, faster, until they reached the top. Then they could climb no higher, and the many-legged creatures were right behind them.

"Be brave!" shouted Billy. "I'll fight them as long as I can." It didn't seem that Billy would be able to fight those fierce creatures more than a minute.

"I wish an airplane would come to our rescue," cried Peggy. An airplane seemed the only thing that could possibly save them.

In answer to Peggy's wish a shadow swept across them. They looked up. Sure enough, there was an airplane swooping down. And behind the first airplane was another and another—a whole flock of them.

But they were very queer airplanes. The aviators hung beneath them and the airplane wings stretched out from the aviators' bodies.

"Why, they are living airplanes," cried Billy. He had no time to say more, for two airplanes dipped down. The aviators stretched out their hands, grabbed Peggy, and bore her into the air.

Two other airplanes darted at Billy and snatched him from the green trunk, just in time to escape the jaws of the many-legged creatures.

"Fear not," spoke the soft voice of one of the aviators in Peggy's ear. "You saved the tiny fairies from their foes the swamp pirates, and now the tiny fairies have saved you."

This surprised Peggy. Where were the fairies? And how had the fairies saved them?

Peggy was to learn soon, and thereby was to get another surprise, as will be told tomorrow.
