LEGION POSTS THERE

Twenty-seven more of Philadelphia's war dead arrived in the Reading Termi al this morning.

The group to greet them was smaller han ever before. Only a few of the hurrying crowds in the station saw fit to stand for a minute with bared heads while the line of baggage trucks passed

The dismal day, heavy enough to force the smoke in the trainshed down around the line of flag-covered caskets, accentuated the mournfulness of toy's consignment.

There must have been something in There must have been something in the mechanical efficiency that moved the bodies of these men that affected one little woman in black who stood siping her eyes some distance from the ne of those who were in formation to allow the bodies to pass through. She stood there, most evidently waiting for smething that she did not want to see, Each time a military voice cried out "Present Arms, Order Arms," she shiv-ered. As each burly baggage master ame along tugging a truck that had procession of mourners behind it peered anxiously at the name on exposed end of the casket. dealy she turned and ran. Liter-
