THE DAILY NOVELETTE

His Love By CLARISSA MACKIE

YN HIS room at the Red Inn, Whitfler paced the floor with long, im-patient strides. Passing his first youth, he was rated among obdurate bachelors, but his eyes had never lost their gay challenge nor his inner vision its boyish ideal ish ideal. At last he left the inn and walked into the country. Many changes there were since the old happy days, but sev-eral familiar landmarks remained; so when he came to a dim lane that dipped down between ancient cedars he stepped dover a broken gate and approached the house by the well-known way, the house by the well-known way, across the orchard and through a gar-den of wonderful roses. Under a great beech tree there was a group of wicker chairs, a tea table, and a woman sitting alone. He could not see her face-- only the shining golden hair and the fluffiness of a lavender gown. She did not see him, so he had time to study his racing pulses, to re-mind himself that she was probably married, and if not married to have learned to detest him for what had hap-pened to break their engagement. Fif-teen years lost out of a woman's life teen years lost out of a woman's life is a tragedy if love has cheated her; he was prepared to meet frozen, calm, deadly cordiality, polite indifference, anything save the glad recognition in her eyes when she turned and placed her hand in his. "Dore!" he exclaimed, "time has stood still in Roseland." "Don't tell me I have not changed," she pouted, tilting a flawless face to his. "Fifteen years does make a difference!" He shook his head helplessly. How did she maintain that elusive charm of eternal youth? He felt years older, and yet he knew that they were nearly of an age. Yet here she was, untouched by the years; a thing of wax, immobile, unfeeling. He had left her in this very spot—how defiant she had been; ruthless in her condemnation ! He had pictured her now a sad woman, at least a well-poised woman, grown away from girlish folly, perhaps a companion for him in their soberer years—and she was youth incarnate still. It made him feel older as he talked to her; replied to her questions about his explorations; his long absence in Africa. He wanted to ask about her "My aunt will be out presently." she hastened to say, and then, "You came straight here from Africa?" "Almost a straight line." he smiled. "I knew you would come." "I knew you would come." "How did you know?" Your arrival in New York was heraided in the papers—such distinguished prodigals do not creep home unnoticed." He laughed, but his eyes were prob-ing her careless face; there was no trace of ombargement as another the second trace of embarrassment, no conscious-ness that she remembered their passionate young love, sacrificed on the sionate young love, sacrificed on the altar of a bitter quarrel. She must have been very happy all these years! He must know—. "I have never heard," he said directly, "Are you married, or are you still Dore Trent?" She haughed and he winced at the gay camaraderie of her voice. "Dear me, yes, I am still Dore Trent. Life is so full of delightful things I want to do if ever I escape from this stupid gar-den."

"You are tired of the garden?" "You would be, poked away here for so many years." Her brown eyes looked beyond the garden walls into the world beyond the garden walls into the world where her restless feet yearned to wan-der, while he, who had roamed the globe, came into the garden a-tiptoe, afraid of disturbing its haunting mem-ories—the hot, sweet breath of many roses, the heavy scent of day illies, the tender fragrance of mignonette, pinks and parales and pansies. During all the lonely, wandering years his memory of the garden had be-come a precious solace, beside jungle campfires and a mirage at the end of long trails. He had been prepared to find her married, older, perhaps dull and uninteresting, and he had been prepared for disillusionment; but somehow her extreme modernity, her veneer of youthful hardness, shocked him.
