"Gracias, amigo," laughed Kendrie end rode on

There was not a more smazed man in all Lower California when Jim Kendric rode up to him. Bruce West was out with two of his men driving a herd of young, wild-looking horses down toward the corrals beyond the house. For an instant his blue eyes stared incredulously: then they filled with shining joy. He swept off his broad hat to wave it wildly about his head; he came swooping down on Kendric as though he to see you!"

Only a youngster, was Bruce West, but manly for all that, who wore his heart on his sleeve, his honesty in his eyes, and who would rather frolie than fight, but would rather fight than do nothing. When last Kendrie had seen him Bruce was nursing his first mustache and glorying in the triumphant fact that soon he would be old enough to vote; now, barely past twenty-three, he looked a trifle thinner than his former hundred and ninety pounds but never a second older. He was a boy with blue eyes and yellow hair and a profound adoration for all that Jim Kendric stood for in his cager eyes.

"Why all the war paint, Baby Blueves?" Kendric asked as they shook hands. For under Bruce's knee was strapped a rifle and a big army revolver rode at his saddle horn.
