day-gowns which probably fill more needs than any other type of garment, since they are fine enough for most day social affairs and are quite possible for the theatre, not to mention being perfect for wearing un-der fur coats. They are made of Canton crepe and various other heavy silk crepes; sometimes a dress is all-black, and sometimes it is black with dashes of color-its upper part may be of henna, or its sleeve linings and girdle may be of jade, and so on. A clever trick is the use of a lighter crepe for the upper than for the lower part of the dress. One charming model has its long flowing sleeves embroidered with copper thread, another closing at the side is embroidered with white; another has jet nailheads for decoration.
