

BLIND PEDDLER OF PENCILS PROVES REAL HAND OF FATE

Christmas Shopping Crowds Provide Stories Old and New, Sad and Gay, for the Bystander

FOOTSTEPS slow and hesitant, fast and tripping; Blind Sara knew them all. And as she sat with her back to the great shop window, holding out her purse and pencils to the passerby, she used to picture to herself those hurrying on. Bright-faced young women, scurrying boys and bustling mothers, changing to the muffled hands of their impatient youngsters.

The streets were crowded with Christmas shoppers. Blind Sara could hear the crackle of loosely wrapped packages, she recognized gay voices calling greetings, and the low undertone of the girls and boys who were meeting to lunch and laugh in the approaching holiday's fun.

But there were few people buying pencils today. The air was clear but it had a cold tang, and the quick-footed people of the street were loathe to stop and pick a colored pencil from the black-gloved hand.

"Dick, let me write it down—exactly what we want engraved in it. Here is a pencil for sale. Why?" Blind Sara heard the light voice break into laughter. "It looks almost like the hand of fate."

"I am sure that's what has guided our happiness," Blind Sara heard the deeper voice of the boy draw near her, and slip a pencil from her stiff hand. "We want to write the initials that are to go into the ring I am buying today," the voice continued. "It will be a beautiful ring though very plain. And we want to reward the hand of fate—"

Blind Sara raised her hand to the small dark purse, and touched a crisp bill.

"The brown pony! mother, watch him dance." The little girl hopped up and down in her excitement so that her little muff bobbed up and bit her chin. "I want a ride on the brown pony!"

The department showing the real shetland ponies was crowded with wide-eyed and excited boys and girls—mostly boys.

"Watch that fellow switch his black tail," a youngster called out, as a pony pacing around the circle drew near him, his blanket swaying beneath his bowed head. The ponies were well-dressed for their Christmas exhibition.

"Mother," asked a little girl, "are the ponies going to have their dinner now?"

"I don't know, dear. Why?" Mother had been asked so many questions that day.

"Cause," Lisbeth said pointing to the ponies' blankets, "they've all got their napkins on."

Bites Off End of Tongue
Helen Roberts, four years old, of 2650 North Leithgow street, accompanied her mother to the store yesterday, fell from the counter where she was seated and bit the end off her tongue. She was taken to St. Christopher's Hospital, where the severed tongue was sewed together.
