

FROM NOW ON

By FRANK L. PACKARD (AUTHOR OF "THE MIRACLE MAN")

THIS BEGINS THE STORY... Dave Henderson, who has come up from the slums to a mansion in an effort to get rich...

BALDY VICKERS and Runtz Mott, who had been sitting in the front seat of the big gray car, were in the hospital from the smash; the others had not been much hurt...

It seemed as though he had been upon a great journey that was crowded with a multitude of strange, fantastic scenes and happenings...

He remembered only one thing distinctly, and that was because it had happened so often...

It was in a bed—in a white bed, with white covers—and there was a screen around his bed...

There came the blast of the engine whistle, the grind and thump of buffer wheels, the shriek of the brakes...

When you beat it from the car, and handed Baldy the broken ribs? Dave Henderson smiled. He was very weak, miserably weak...

It was Barjan, Lieutenant Joe Barjan, of the Frisco plain clothes squad

He opened his eyes. He did not understand at first; and then he told himself quite simply that of course he could not still be lying on the floor...

There was silence. The other spoke again: "Tough luck, Dave. Sorry to grab you like this. Feeling better?"

There was a knock at the door. He must close it—he must close the door. The train was stopping...

ing often to little more than a whisper, mumbled endlessly on. That was the old bomb thrower, old Tony Lomazzi, the fiercest in the next cell...

He was still early evening in early summer, and there was still light in the cell, though hardly enough to read by...

He sat suddenly bolt upright on his cot. He had not forgotten the horror of those days of solitary confinement...

He spoke aloud unconsciously. "It's a long time to wait." "You bet your life it is!" said Barjan.

cell, and his face, lean and hard, softened, and, tingling the dead-white prison pallor, a flush crept into his cheeks...
