Uncommon Sense

By JOHN BLAKE

Unselfishness Has a Limit. HALF the people in the world were utterly unselfish, the other half would be utterly selfish.

Unselfishness has a limit. If you decide to go through life with no thought for your own interests, you will have just as much to complain about as if you had no thought for your own interests.

Unselfishness has a limit. The selfish people in the world are really made selfish by the mistaken unselfishness of silly parents.

Unselfishness has a limit. Learn, a "foolish, fond, old man," will remain for all time the pattern of unselfishness which beget the most cruel selfishness.

Unselfishness has a limit. THE parent who thinks that he is being kind by giving his child everything he wants, by never crossing him, and by seeking to clear his path of all difficulties, is really doing a vast unkindness to the child.

Unselfishness has a limit. The boy—if it happens to be a boy—grows up expecting to find all the world ready to yield to him as were his father and mother.

Unselfishness has a limit. He is never happy, because one who rapidly acquires the habit of wanting more and more. There is a limit to possible gratification, and when he reaches it, he becomes sour.
