

Uncommon Sense : Hurrying Nowhere
By JOHN BLAKE

It is well enough to hurry if you know where you are going, why you are going there, and how to get there. Otherwise hurry is merely a waste of valuable energy.

The average man hurries out of bed, hurries through his dressing, hurries to his work, and hurries through his work—all to save time which will be utterly wasted when his work is done.

The working pace of the world has increased out of all proportion to the rate of production.

The man who rushes about his office or shop, or rushes frantically through the streets, imagines he is a hustler. Other people also imagine he is a hustler. Yet he usually does not get as much accomplished at the end of the week as his more casual neighbor.

THE object of all hurry ought to be to save time—but there is no use saving time unless it is put to use once it is saved.

As well save a great sum of money which you would immediately lose into the street as to save time for no purpose but to let it slip through your fingers.

Saving time is as difficult as saving money, and making it count when you have saved it is far more difficult.

For the store of time you accumulate, unlike money, cannot be piled up in a bank in the form of frozen energy. It must be used immediately or it will be gone.

Every ounce of energy you have is valuable. You cannot realize on all of it in actual productivity or saving; but you can, if you are careful, get a far higher percentage of value out of it than you are getting now.

IF, IN hurrying through your work to save time, you use the time saved only for loafing, you have foolishly near-lected your work, and done a very poor stroke of business.

Before you hurry, think why you are hurrying. If it is to gain time that you expect to use, well and good. If it is merely to give yourself a few more hours to idle away, stop hurrying. It will only harm you.

CAN'T RAISE BABY IN SHACK. MRS. GARLAND DECLARES

Wife of Idealist Explains Reason for Separation
Dedham, Mass., Jan. 20.—Mrs. Charles A. Garland yesterday gave an interview on the subject of her relations with her husband since the latter decided to accept his share of his father's fortune. Her action was prompted, she explained, to dispel "ridiculous stories" that are going about.

Were it not for the baby and the comforts and care it needs, she would, to use her own words, "go to North Carver at once and live in the little old shack with her husband." She visits him frequently, she said, and he comes to see her in her new home here. They correspond regularly.

"One cannot raise a baby properly under conditions that exist at the place in North Carver," said Mrs. Garland.

"One cannot bathe an infant in a fire-place, for instance. And you may say for me that this is the sole reason for our living apart."

"I knew of Mr. Garland's idealistic views before I married him, and I am entirely willing he should work out his own ideas of life and happiness. He has given me a third of the money that came to him, and because of the baby I have taken it. Money is a vital factor in bringing it up properly."

"Mr. Garland is happy and I am happy. There is not the slightest bit of ill feeling between us because of the course he is following."
