WHEN THE experienced motorist driving a car that can go seventy miles an hour, is passed by a Stanley going thirty-five, in spite of his attempt to accelerate and prevent it, he is apt to confuse control with speed. and tell others that there is no limit to the speed the Stanley

This is injurious misinformation. It is misleading.

In the service for which automobiles are bought and usedtransportation on the highway-the stored power in the Stanley gives it a pickup, an instantaneous flight, an ability to take a desirable place in the traffic inoffensively and safely, and hold it, a facility to overcome bad driving situations and take advantage of good ones, and a general all-round superiority to cover the distance between points irrespective of road, load, or season, which are unmatchable in any

Manufacturers of gear-shift cars, unable to supply these factors, are still forced to feature a prohibitive sustained speed, although, as cars increase in number, it is of less and less benefit in the every-day use of an automobile.

When the experienced motorist says, "The Stanley is the fastest car on the road-in the service for which automobiles are bought," he is right.
