A Philosopher

Dear Cynthia—Your advice to "One More American" was very good. How long will we have to wait before some girls awake from the fact that not all males are alike? Isn't it extremely foolish to suppose that millions of men have their emotions and tastes woven in the same patterns and dumped from the identical molds? The old axiom that what is one person's meat is another's poison is as true now as then. Nothing is more amusing than to read articles on "How to Manage a Husband," knowing that there are fifty-seven varieties of them. Of course, "One More American," if your mate is a conceited man, it will be quite all right to keep him guessing. Loving himself overly much, he won't need any help from you. If not, well, he may believe you honest, take you at your word and board with some one else who doesn't think him endowed with the powers of mind-reading. Once wrecked on the rocks of suspicion, the good ship Faith very rarely makes another voyage.

Rand said finally. "Will you come downstairs where we can talk?"

In silence she followed him down to the sitting room. Her heart was beating fast. Was there more to this than she had already discovered? She seated herself on the edge of a chair, and Rand, after walking up and down the room restlessly, turned to her suddenly.

She Asks Readers' Opinions

Dear Cynthia—Although always an interested reader of your column, this is my first letter to you and your readers for advice. I would like to have some of your male readers like "Mr. America," "Lieutenant, B" and a few other worthwhile writers answer it. Suppose you were going with a girl whom you professed to care for very much, so that you had made her believe it, and you had a misunderstanding which severed your friendship. Would you men have more respect and be inclined to renew your acquaintance again, if you saw that the girl raised her head independently and continued serenely on her way, although secretly caring very much indeed? Or, on the other hand, would the girl, who made the first advances and came seeking for your loss and came again, win out? other hand, would the girl, who made the first advances and came seeking for your love and understanding again, win out? Understand, please, in this case both parties are stubborn and equally at fault. We have had quarrels before, but this one seems more serious than the rest. That is why I am seeking your advices
