Each nation has a style of kitchen peculiarly its own and I will give you some idea in this column of many nations and country customs that will give many hoad angle on the food habits a broad angle on the food habits many folks.

A Ship's Kitchen
The kitchen or ship's galley is really model kitchen; the cook in this kitchen stands before his range, and yet can reach all the stores, and the stores without moving. without moving; here every ach of space is used to the best advantage. Immaculately clean, this galley is crubbed as white as snow. The bread pastry boards are made to slide table or into a closet, while a rack with sturdy hooks just beside the ange holds the saucepans scoured to ing cleanliness. Knives are scoured and placed in a rack made by nailing a strip of wood at intervals against the wall. This strip is painted. Holes are drilled in all metal spoons and they, too, are hung from hooks. Foodstuffs and supplies like sugar, salt, cereal and and rats and mice from reaching them.

food is not up to standard; if the ship is under naval discipline the cook would be punished if the complaint about the food was just. Ship captains, who are really master of all they behold when at sea, demand and obtain from the ship's cook good food for the entire

Seafaring men will tell you nothing will make trouble at sea half so quickly as poor food, so for this reason the captain usually puts forth every effort to secure a good ship's cook. When seafaring men come ashore to live they construct their kitchens to conform with that of the ship, for one old salt told me that he didn't want to spend the day running around in a circle spend the day running around in a circle in the kitchen, and then, too, a big kitchen would make him leg weary and consume a lot of time. I have visited many retired sailors and find this idea among the entire lot of them,

This should be very encouraging to the woman who has small kitchen space nd encourage her to follow the example of the ship's cook and make things shipshape and sning so that she can give the family good, substantial, wholesome cooked well and served appetizingly.
