Nancy Wynne Chats About Many Persons Sailing Today for Europe-She Sees Some Smart Clothes Worn by Members of the Younger Set.

HAVE you seen that stunning gray suit Rhoda Brooke is wearing? She is the daughter of Mrs. Trenchard Newbold, and spent last winter in Eu-rope, having made her debut the year before. She has a suit of soft gray and a lovely gray hat trimmed with a bunch of purple and exquisite blue flowers; or it may be fruit, for she passed me rather uickly the other day, and I could only distinguish the smart colors and the rolly Griscom is back from the South and was in town a few days ago in an awfully smart suit of dark brown, with which she wears a 'ighter brown fur. Her hat was of orange felt and the crown was trimmed with velvet nastur-tiums. Polly is very dark, you know, and the hat was one of the most becoming I have ever seen her wear.

MRS. JOE WIDENER did not go down to Palm Beach, as usual, MRS. JOE WIDENER did not go down to Palm Beach, as usual, this winter, but has been staying for several weeks in New York buying clothes and arranging for a summer in Newport. Last year she and Mr. Widener did not go to Newport for more than a few weeks, and while there stopped at a hotel. This season, however, they have taken a villa and will they have taken a villa and will

The other evening, gracefully pulling at the down on his upper lip, brother entered her room, and not seeing her in her usual chair before seeing her in her usual chair before the fire, he walked over to the mirror, continuing the twirling of the minute fuzz, awaiting her coming upstairs.

Suddenly Edith appeared in the doorway and, gazing at him in horror, exclaimed: "What are you doing here?" "We'll, for heaven's sake," answered brother, "why should I not be here? Don't I often come into talk. Good night! I thought you'd never set through your bath."

DREAMLAND ADVENTURES

"Witch Night"

Judge Oct runs way with a Witch's broomstick, and takes Jack and Janet on a search for Fairyland. They travel to the far North but fail to find it there.

CHAPTER III

Jungleland TACK and Janet were not surprised to learn from the Eskimo lad that Tairyland was not in the far North. They had already made up their minds that fairies would not like to live in the great wastes of snow and ice.

"Let us go to the warm country and seek Fairyland there," cried Jack, shivering with the cold.

Suddenly they heard the fierce scream of an animal. This was followed by a crashing and a swishing below. They looked down. There was a man, tattered, torn, desperate. He was lost in the jungle. Blindly he fought his was through the undergrowth. The giant ferns blocked him. The vines tripped him. He had to cut a path with tripped him. He had to cut a path with a huge knife.

"Whoo! Whoo! Phoo! Phoo!" hoote!
Judge Owl, peering about anxiously.
"It looks to me like a tropical jungle.
Traveling birds have told me about such places. They look beautiful, but dangers are there—dangers and evils everywhere. Beware!"

Jack and Janet couldn't believe dangers and evils could be in such a lovely place. Everything looked peaceful and happy. The man had been saved, but nev The man had been saved, but new dangers surrounded him. The roar of the gun had aroused the jungle. Monekys appeared by dozens in the trees. They chattered excitedly at the man. They threw things at him. Parrots screamed. Mosquitoes and other evil insects swarmed about his head. He couldn't fight them off. And there was no place for him to flee.

Wore than all, a squirming danger was drooping from a tree above him.

"Hoo! Hoo! Too! Too-oo!" shricked Judge Owl like a locomotive. He steered the Witch's broomstick toward the Bouth, and in less time than it takes to tell they had left the frozen North far behind. They keed through ballary weather and then the air grew hot.

Down dipped the broomstick, coming to rest like a bird in a tree beside a river.

Jack and Janet gave shouts of delight. They were in a most wonderful forest. Glant trees grew in dense masses. Lacy vines dropped from them like draperies. Flowering plants and jaint ferns filled the spaces below. Stipling waters of the broad river.

"See that cat," whispered Janet.

"Isn't it big?"
Indeed it was big—as big as a large line of the water. Jack leaned over. grasped the man by the collar and held him up. The broomstick skimmed swiftly along, turned a bend, and there was a village. The inan was landed on the shore.

"You are safe," said Jack to the man. "Now can you tell us where to find Fairyland?"

"It is not in this jungle," cried the man. "There are no fairles here, only purells and poisons. If you would find from his shoulder and looked up. It form his shoulder and l
