"But don't you see." he interrupted quickly, "our life is bound to be differ-ent? I hated that shut-in life in Lynbrook; I was never happy there, and now, O, Judy, we could be so happy, if only you would try to understand." It was the first time that Judy had been rational and willing to talk since they had come to New York, and Rand was eager to push his opportunity. He came and knelt down by her side in his earnestness, but even then he was con-scious of the fact that Judy had not stopped her work. She went on shell-
