

The Daily Novelette : : By Jane Osborn
Jim Takes His Lunch

AUNT SALLY STONE had come to spend a few months with her nephew, Jim Leroy; and therein lay advantages and disadvantages for Jim. It was pleasant to think that one of his own kind would sit across from him at dinner in the dining-room of the apartment hotel where he made his home. It was not so pleasant to have to burden himself with the duty of telephoning to Aunt Sally when he would be half an hour late. It was pleasant to think that his socks would be regularly darned and that all mending buttons would be replaced on his shirts. It was not so pleasant when Aunt Sally became solicitous and inquisitive regarding Jim's matrimonial prospects. There was not a girl's picture on his bureau or desk. There were no feminine letters in the mail or in Jim's coat pockets. Nor did Jim have any evening engagements save those he explained as of business importance.

have money saved to buy furniture and things," said Molly frankly. Then she stopped, wishing she had not been so frank. "Are you thinking of being married?" said Jim with difficulty. "I did not know you were engaged." "Oh, I'm not engaged—of course not," said Molly in confusion, "but most girls are eventually." They had reached on the porch by this time and Jim stayed Molly's hand before it touched the bell. He took the hand tenderly in his and watched to see whether her expression showed resentment. Seeing none, he took courage. "Would you—could you—do you think you'd care to be engaged to me?" And before Molly pressed the button that summoned her watchful mother to the door she had said yes to Jim's query.
