THE MASTER OF MAN:—By Sir Hall Caine

An Outspoken and Moving Study of a Deep Sex Problem by the Noted Author of "The Manxman," "The Deemster," "The Eternal City," "The Woman Thou Gavest Me," Etc.

PERSONS OF THE STORY
VICTOR STOWELL—Chief Judge of the late island, who, in a moment of mutual passion, had, to great later regret, seduced the girl who became his wife. He is now a man of 40, and is in love with Fenella.
BESSIE COLLETT—A beautiful girl who, in a moment of mutual passion, had, to great later regret, seduced the man who became her husband. She is now a woman of 40, and is in love with Fenella.
ALICE—A beautiful girl who, in a moment of mutual passion, had, to great later regret, seduced the man who became her husband. She is now a woman of 40, and is in love with Fenella.
FENELLA STOWELL—A great-hearted and beautiful girl with advanced ideas on woman's rights, who is in love with Victor and he with her. She becomes Bessie's friend.

If you hadn't stayed away so long it wouldn't have happened at all

HE REMOVED to Douglas—the Fort Aniff Hotel, a breezy place, which sits on the ledge of the headland and just over the harbor. At first the babble and movement of the hotel distracted him, but after a day or two he was drawn back into the meliorism of his own thoughts.

Crushed and ashamed, he would creep up to bed through the silent house, and thinking of the girl whose dark eyes had intoxicated him in the glen (the girl he had afterwards held in his arms) he would say:

"Is it possible that I can stand by and see her given over to the hangman?"

That terrified him. In the darkness he pictured to himself the scene of Bessie's death and burial, and thought of his after-life as a judge, when he would have to go to Court to try other such cases—and Bessie lying out there in the prison-yard.

After Ballinmoor, with its pastoral tranquillity, the twilight of blue and the sleepy singing of the streams, Fort Anne was sometimes a tempestuous place, with the wash of the waves in the harbor, and the monotonous moan of the sea outside and the melancholy cry of the gulls. He thought he heard Bessie's cry in the voice of the sea—her piercing cry when she was being carted out of court after he had sentenced her.

One night he thought Bessie was dead. He was dead, too. They were standing side by side in an awful tribunal and she was accusing him before God.

"He let me die! He killed me! He is my assassin!"

By God! If it was a question of Bessie witnessing against him in this world or in the next, he had no longer any doubt which it should be. No more temptations! No more hypocrisy and self-doubt! No more wandering about like a lost soul!

He would go up to the Governor. He would call upon him to withdraw his objection to the jury's recommendation. And if he refused, he should see what he should see.

At 8 o'clock in the morning he was walking down the quay in the calm sunshine, looking at the activities of the harbor, and nodding cheerfully to the fishermen as he passed. He was on his way to Government House, and his conscience, with which he had wrestled so long, was triumphant and erect.

"To his rooms in Ramsey? The first Saturday in August, miss." Fenella went home, happy, miserable, tingling with shame and yet thrilled with love also. Stowell's victim had brought her heart back to him.

It was just because he had loved her more than he had loved that girl in prison that the worst had happened. It was just because she herself had persuaded, constrained and almost compelled him that he had set on the case, not fully knowing what was to be revealed by it.

The Governor's carriage met her at the Douglas station, and when (wiping the scorching tears from her eyes) she reached Government House, she found another carriage standing by the porch. "Miss Janet Curphey is here to see you, miss," said the maid.

From the day of the trial, when Victor had returned home with a white face and said, "It doesn't matter now," Janet had known what had occurred.

That Colliester girl had corrupted Victor. She had always feared it would be so since "Auntie Kitty" had whispered over her counter that that "forward thing" of Lisa Corten's was boasting that Mr. Stowell had been "sooeying" with her in the glen. And now she had brought him under the very shadow of shame itself, just when life looked so bright and joyful.

It was a dull afternoon when she set off for Douglas, and as she drove along the coast road she rehearsed to herself the sharp things she was going to say. But when Fenella came into the drawing room, looking so pale as to be scarcely recognizable as the radiant girl she used to be, and kissed her and sat down by her side, Janet could scarcely say anything.

At length (Miss Green, who had been sitting at tea with her, having gone) Janet braced herself, and said, not without a tremor:

"I've come about Victor."
"Then he has told you?" said Fenella.
"Dead he hasn't, and you needn't either, because I know."
Fenella drew her hand away and dropped her head.

"Don't say he hasn't done wrong," said Janet, "but you seem to think he's the only one who is to blame."
"No, no! I see now that the girl in Castle Rushen."
"The girl? I'm not thinking about the girl. Of course she is to blame. But is there nobody else to blame also?"
"Who else?"
"Yourself."

CHAPTER XXXIII
The Heart of a Woman
Meanwhile Fenella had been going through her own temptation. On the night after the trial, having bathed her swollen eyes, she went down to dinner. Her father looked searchingly at her for a moment, and, as soon as they were alone he said:

intended it for him. Just when you were to become his wife, too, and you were the only woman in the world to him!"

"I was so shocked—I thought he wasn't the man I had taken him for." "Perhaps he wasn't, perhaps he was, but thousands of women have lost faith in their men and clung to them for all that, and they're the salt of the earth, I say. I'm only an old maid myself, but to stand up for your husband, right or wrong, that's what I call being a wife, if you ask me."

Fenella could bear up no longer. She flung her arms about Janet's neck and buried her face in her breast. The darkness was gathering before they broke from their embrace and then it was time for Janet to smooth out her silvery hair and go. Fenella saw her to the carriage and whispered as she kissed her.

"Tell him to come back to me." And then Janet went home with shining eyes.

You will know in a week that Pepsodent means to you and yours a new era in teeth cleaning. You will learn the way to benefits and beauties which you would not go without.

Don't Scratch Teeth

That's not the way to fight film

Don't try to whiten teeth by using harsh abrasives. Any enamel you remove is gone forever. Polishing agents should be mild, as they are in Pepsodent. Cloudy teeth are due to dingy film. There is now a way to combat it—a scientific way. Millions now employ it. Leading dentists the world over now advise it. This is to urge that you try it—free—and see how your teeth improve.

That unsightly film
Teeth are dimmed by film-coats. At first the film is viscous. But it clings to teeth, gets between the teeth and stays. Then, too, film is the basis of tartar.

The teeth's great enemy
Film is the teeth's great enemy. Most tooth troubles are now traced to film. It holds food substance which ferments and forms acids. It holds the acids in contact with the teeth to cause decay.

How to fight film
Dental science has for years sought ways to fight that film. Two effective methods have been found. Able authorities have amply proved them. Leading dentists the world over are urging their adoption.
