A Twice Told Tale

A producer who supplies us with very fine quality coal dropped in for a visit.

After passing the time of day he began talking about the non-produc-tion of coal. Apparently he became afraid that he was unduly discour-aging, for he interrupted himself to assure us that in the opinion of his people, everything was working out alright. He considered it wise to buy lightly and only for immediate needs, because when the situation cleared, coal was likely to be lower. He begged us not to get scared, a little patience was all that was

At this point we handed him a recent advertisement headed-"There is no reason to be panicky."

"That's what we are saying to our friends," we told him. He read it and looked up with a grin, "Why. that's just what I came to tell you."

Use That Old Two-Slide Tuning Coil

Thousands of boys and men who became interested in wireless telgraphy in the carly days made or bought the old- fashioned two-slide tuning coil. This, for the benefit of the newcomers. is simply one long continuous coil of wire wound around a cylinder. The insulation is removed all along the coll in a straight line, and over this bare-wire line or path two little metal strips can be slid along two rods. As they slide Earth, they make contact with the wires over which they pass and the current flows from the wire through the blade or strip along the metal rod on which it slides and so to the binding posts and the receiving set. This was the best of the home-made devices in the old days, and it was the cheapest of the good devices which the manufacturer turned out.

Most of us wanted "loose couplers" with one coil (the secondary), sliding in and out of the other (the primary). We thought it was necessary to have a primary and secondary, and indeed it was. But when we used the old twoslide tuner we really had both primary and secondary without knowing it, unless we had gone rather far in the study of the then infant science.

The part of the coil included between the aerial connection and the ground connection was the primary; the other was the secondary. It was what the highbrow radio scientists called "conducive" coupling-though unscientific readers need not worry about that.

In spite of these high-sounding words the simple fact that we are leading up. to is that the old two-slide tuner can be taken down from the garret, the dust brushed off and it can be hooked up to the modern audion bulb so as to give mighty good results as a "regenerative" set and you can get the broad-cast concerts on it just about as well as with any of the simple single-circuit hook-ups.

The old tuner, when used with the nudion, is not, though, a single-circuit arrangement. It is better. You have all seen, in the stores, those attractive little mountings that use three colls—either the neat honeycomb colls or the spider web. One coll is used as the primary, one as the sec-ondary, and one as the "tickler." As we have already learned in these talks, the primary is the coll through which the received currents flow from the rial to the ground, these in turn "in-ce" or create currents in the secondary, though the two colls have no real connection, and the "tickler" takes the strong electricity from the "B" battery and makes it boost up and strengthen the "induced" currents in

This three-coil hook-up is a very popular one, but is likely to be expensive. The two-slide tuner, as used in the illustration, becomes all three coils at once and will do just about anything that the three-goil arrangements will do. The first part of the coll, between the acrial and the grounded slider, is the primary; the part between the two sliders is the secondary, and the part between the second slider and the connection to the variable condenser be-comes the tickler. You can tune the first two parts by moving the silders, but that leaves the third part, or tickler, fixed, so we put in the variable condenser to tune that and to keep the self as it would do if the condenser were

The usual two-slide tuner has a binding post for each slider, and one for the ground wire. In this circuit you must make one mere come tion at the end opposi c the ground connection. You can solder the end of a wire there as indicated. Or if the construction of your tuner admits it, you can bend a stelp of brass and serew it to the wooder apright on one end so that the edge of the brass goes down solidly and makes ontact with the bare wire on the coil. In tuning in signals, give a guess at he number of turns on the primary part on a four-inch diameter coil perhap-Mal. Then use your one hand for the other shiler and the other hand for the cariable contenser. Sible the slider up toward the first one until you hear a monning in the idence. Then slowly bring it away, all the time turning the andenser around all the way one way nd back again. Hunting by this method will soon give on a signal, if the wiring is correctly lone. And the book-up is capable of semarkably time adjustments and a very fair ability to tune out interference. Naturally this book-up is for audion outle only and will not do for a crysta

For the benefit of those who have For the order never used a two-sade timer, and who are not particularly launly with theis, we will so n give directions for building this little instrument, for it is remarkably easy to construct and any boy can make one that will give him the isroad eas's and introduce him to the art of ruggingri, 1914 by Makis Tellari Kumpany

THE JOYS of motoring are what science calls objective and subjective. They are objective when the mind dwells upon the perfect functioning of the car, its sweet and silent and powerful engine; its graceful, trim and lowhung body-when, in short, one enjoys the car as a car. They are subjective when one forgets the car, and yields to the satisfaction and pleasure the car so surely delivers, the unobtrusive but abundant nature of its dependable, daily, enduring service.
