"Let's go and see," said Jack. "If they are having a nightmare, we ought to wake them up." Jack and Janet didn't wait to dress, but ran out in their pajamas.

The ponies were not dreaming, but very much awake. They were sniffing the air cagerly, and after each sniff they would argue anew. "Elephant." "Lion!" "Tiger!" "Monkey!"

"What is all this row about?" cried ick. "You are waking folks up!" Savage Visitors TRINIE and Topsy, the ponies, were their stable. They made so much noise they awakened Jack and Janet. The children hopped out of bed and ran to their windows. "What is the matter?" cried Janet. "What is the matter?" cried Janet. "The ponies greeted them with neighs of joy. "Now we can settle this thing." said Trixie. "Don't you smell an elephant and a tiger?" "No! No!" said Topsy. "Don't you smell a lion and a monkey?"

Jack and Janet lifted their noses and

"The ponies are arguing over some-thing," replied Jack. "Listen !" As they listened the neighs and sniffed as the ponies were doing. But all they could smell was the usual clean odor of the forest—the pines, the mosses squeals turned into words. "I tell you I smell an elephant !" and the flowers.
