

Should One Marry if Not Eager to? Is Winifred Harper Cooley's Question

HE IS a charming bachelor. More than twenty years ago he was very much in love with her. She refused him and married another man.

But time brings about strange and subtle changes. The once ardent young lover had cooled and drifted into the kind and unselfish friend.

TURNING forty, she decided that she might as well take this local man and settle down to life with a "good provider." No matter how we may camouflage the fact remains that our matrimonial chances are not so numerous as they once were.
