She brushed her tears away. She began to say in a quivering voice: "What a dear little room, Netta-"Elizabeth!" Elizabeth rose to her feet and looked around with wild eyes; she thought she must be dreaming-one of the many cruel dreams that had tortured her during the past five months. Royston stood there by the door; his face was gray with passionate agitation, but he tried to smile as their eyes met, "My dear," he said, and held out his arms. Elizabeth gave a broken, sobbing cry;

she covered her eyes with her hands
-she felt as if she was falling-then strong arms caught and held her, and her head was pressed to a man's throb-bing heart. "I love you—I love you." She heard him say it over and over again, as if the words could never be spoken often enough; then he gently raised her, holding her face between raised her, holding her face between his hands, looking into her eyes.
"I never thought I should hold you in my arms again." he said. "I thought —forgive me—that I was forgotten." Elizabeth tried to answer, but her voice seemed to have gone; she lifted her arms and clasped them round his neck, then the tears came, and she cried her heart out in the shelter of his arms.

And his own eyes were wet as he held her closely, whispering that he loved her, and again how dearly he loved her, till at last her sobbing ceased and she lay quiet.

And presently Royston put the ruffled hair back from her face with a tender hand, and bending asked:

"Elizabeth, how much longer must I wait to kiss you?"

Improvements, slow and careful in some areas, relatively fast in others, is the opinion given by Bradstreet's in the weekly review of business. The digest finds 'more doing' in June than there was in May, while the advance over June a year ago was "unmistakable."

"In industry," says the Review, "the trend is at'll toward expansion, this despite the continuance of the coal strike and the talk of railroad workers outside of the active operative branches, stopping work. In the case of the threatened rail strike, as in that of the coal miners, there seems to be a good deal of public 'ndifference."
