BUILDING OF AN ARMY. By John Dickinson. New York: Century Company.

A supprehensive discussion of the recognized and an acceptance of the paid detectors of crime and criminals it must be said, their task is much harder than that of the author, who can tie up his or her story into innumerable twists and then unravel it by a click of the typewriter. And why not? Wasn't the answer lurking around when the twists were supplied?

"The Secret Toll" (Dodd, Mead & Co.), the latest mystery effusion of the authors of "The Sheridan Road Mystery," and also laid in Chicago. These weavers of the tale intricate make no bones of their contempt for the detective ability of the average policeman. But in defense of the paid detectors of crime and criminals it must be said, their task is much harder than that of the author, who can tie up his or her story into i Stanley-Added to "Tol'ble David" and "The Seventh Day," "Sonny" makes the confirmed movie-goer almost inclined to think that the new combination of Charles Duell, president; Henry King, director, and Bichard Barthelmess, star. spells the nearest approach to genuinely artistic and convincing film production that the industry has today. With four or five such organisations in the field there would be none of the present attitude of skepticism as to the possibility of the screen becoming a medium for sincere and artistic self-expression.

"Sonny" is a homely story woven about the old theme of two men who bear such a striking resemblance that they cannot be told apart. One is the son of wealthy assents, the other a long son of wealthy parents, the other a lone child of fate, whom we first meet in his Hoboken poolroom. The war throws them together, the rich man is killed and the other fulfills a dying wish to return to his buddy's blind mother as her son and to live the part to spare her the heartbreak of losing her boy.

The whole plot is worked out in scenario form with exceptional skill and smoothness and it evipes the interest page is reached.

A wealthy young Chicagoan is a target for blackmailers — apparently blackhanders. While the police blunder along seeking clues, but finding none, he decides to solve the mystery himself. Before he does so he suspects the girl he loves, the private detective he has bired and a course. tective he has hired and a couple of Italian money-seekers, but finally pins smoothness, and it grips the interest from the start and holds it to the finish. Barthelmess plays the double part and he does it probably better than any-thing he has yet attempted. Mr. Duell has again surrounded his star by a 'hand-picked' company, and perhaps none of them does quite so surprisingly well as pretty Lucy Fox, heretofore familiar as a serial player with "Hurri-cane Hutch" and the Seitz thrillers. Miss Fox shows a promise as a genuine actrees that should be given more frequent opportunity in such roles.

Margaret Seddon, appealingly human as ever, is the blind mother of the rich youth, and dainty Pauline Garon is a delightful little sister. Herbert Grimwood plays a character part that ranks Their Minds, Manners and Traits among the really revolting villians of the screen, and Patterson Dial, just genuine girl, is fine in the part of the "Y" worker who brings the substitute son home to soften the anguish of the dead boy's mother.

Photography, editing, direction and recein settings are all up to the high scenic settings are all up to the high level set by the Barthelmess organiza-tion in his previous starring vehicles, ten no more able work than "The Minds and Manners of Wild Animals" (Charles Scribner's Sons), and there has not been a book on a zoological and one of the most pleasing features of this picture, as it has been of the other subject for many a day that can com-pare in fascination and varied interest with this. Subtitled "A Book of Per-sonal Observations," it has all the autwo, is the sprinkling of flashes of keen humor of a kind that is quiet but dramatic in its effective contrasts with the more serious episodes in the story.

Karlton-With backgrounds that have seldom been approached, let alone equaled, on the screen and a cast that includes old and new favorites in great profusion, there seems to be no logical reason why so pronounced a stage hit as "The Man From Home" shouldn't be a world-beating picture. Unfortunately it isn't. The fault lies with studies and hunting and collecting in all parts of the world over a long life a notably varied and significant mass of information. But the is more than a mere record or chronicle. Dr. Horna-day has brought his wide ranging and the scenario writer.
As it stands, the picturized version of "The Man From Home" is an in-

BREATHTAKING ADVENTURES

Who in the great "white collar" army has not allowed his imagination to run riot on mythical adventures in which he, the poor desk-shackled clerk, was the hero of gore-filled escapades? That is just what bespectacled Peter Duff did from his office in Fleet street. Only he used to put his imagination into words and his chums were used to hear of his breathtaking adventures. Harrison and Dakin specialized in cleverness and put in song, dance and music. Opening "The Three of Us" with a clever song they proceeded to a number of more clever additions and ended with a clever burlesque on a three-piece band. Through it all Billy Hogue was a clever accomplice.

No less meritorious were Mullen and Francis, the fastest working, hardesthitting, rapid-fire producers of witticisms and at times wisdom, that have been seen here for some time.

An interrogatory list drawn up the learned Edison pales into insignificance before the questioning onslaughts of Moss and Frye, who desire to know, among other things, if the Brooklyn Bridge was built to shade the fish, and how wide would the river under it be if it had only one bank.
