We Must PAY For What Life Gives

Anita Prescott thought she wanted freedom, after four years of an 'unfortunate, hasty marriage" with a man who was clearly "not her sort." Love had blinded her eyes. Michael had not been the success she had proudly told her people he would be. Visionary, a dreamer, an inventor, he had succeeded in nothing but his boundless love for her, and now she felt that to be but a dragging fetter.

A year's separation and then divorce—peace, a return to her own social circles, maybe another grasp of life's pleasures. But, she chose to spend the year in a little white cottage with Miriam, the woman the village boys called vile names, the woman the neighbors shunned.

From Miriam, whose deep draught from the cup of life had brought clarity of vision, Anita learned the fundamental law of life; that "what happiness we have in life we must pay for." If unwilling to pay, the happiness is but a mirage.
