Miss May McCarter, Who Was Publisher's Secretary, Says He Tired of Wife

WILL CASE ENDS TODAY

Miss May McCarter, secretary Thompson McClure, aged publisher, who died in the Philadelphia Hospital. took the stand today in the Orphans' Court, Camden, where McClure's widow trying to break her husband's will.

Regarding her alleged influence over her employer, who named her executrix of his estate. Miss McCarter denied ever having interfered with her employer's business or personal habits. "It was not my influence that caused

Mr. McClure to leave his wife." Miss McCarter said. "He began tiring of his wife shortly after Christmas last year. He repeatedly told me that Mrs. McClure was continually on the streets and always borrowing money.

I know that he communicated with department stores at which Mrs. Mc-Clure had accounts and told them to cancel the charges. He became sus-pictous of her when she received numerous letters and after reading them placed them in the fire.

Miss McCarter said she had never seen the McClurs will until after the publisher's death. She admitted that McClure told her she was to be executrix of his estate.

Concerning Mrs. McClure's state-ments that her husband had been spirited away. Miss McCarter said that McClure had called his home at Woodlynne the day he went away, but was unable to get a reply. Then he got in touch with Dr. Moore, a neighbor, and he was going away for a rest and not to worry about him.

Bluecoat Was Endeavoring to Collect Debt From Alleged Slayer on Sixth Street

WOMAN IS QUIZZED

A patrolman's effort to collect a private debt and not a raid led to the fatal shooting of Patrolman James Lambert and the wounding of Bernard Montague, another patrolinan, shortly after 4 o'clock yesterday morning, according to May Dix Berry, companion of the alleged slayer.

The woman, who police say was with Frank Prati, the alleged slayer at the time of the shooting, told the authori-ties today Lambert and Montague came to Prati's house on Sixth street near Callowhill to collect $5 on some jewelry which she says Lambert sold Prati. There was an argument and the shooting followed.
