No. 228-A Pitcher and a Stick

A stick, or cane, is passed through the handle of a large pitcher, and spectators are allowed to hold both ends of the stick. The performer then anabounces that he can take the pitcher of the stick, without the holders re-moving their hands, which he finally does. It would be impossible to do the trick in the way the audience thinks the performer means, that is to pass the handle of the pitcher through the stick. What the performer does is to lift up the pitcher and hold it so that the handle does not touch the stick. Thus the terms of the problem have been is with the performer actually
