

'MOLLY DARLING' HAS YOUTH AND ACTION

Jack Donahue Supplies Comedy and Rescues Musical Show at Garrick

Garrick—All remarks about musical comedies having weak and inferior lyrics are hereby corrected. "Molly Darling," the latest addition to the school of pretty Irish comedians who have given their names to shows, certainly improves on accounts.

In the best act it is merely a group of five or six youngsters doing their very best to make things pleasant for the audience. That they succeed, with some pretty witty material, is every-thing to their credit. In the last act, however, there is a speaking of the action and a new cast to the comedy and the afore-mentioned young people have great burdens lifted from their shoulders.

"Molly Darling" belongs to the sentimental school of musical comedy, gaining its effect, as the "The Girl" and "The Boy" do, by the sentimentalism of the lyrics and the simple, unaffectedness of the music.

When the sentiment becomes too thick it is saved by the sprinkling with a laugh, and the result is a comedy which could have been done by "The Merry Men" or "The Merry Women."

Mary Malthus is the Molly and her comic music is the music of the show. "Molly Darling" is a comedy which is a little bit of everything, and it is a comedy which is a little bit of everything.

"Molly Darling" is one of those comedies which is a little bit of everything, and it is a comedy which is a little bit of everything.

This adaptation of J. A. Mitchell's very popular novel of a number of years past, "Amos Judd," has been treated every possible manner to make the romantic orientalism of "The Sheik," but it is very doubtful whether the result can be given much pleasure.
