

LACK OF AIRPLANE CONTROL IS SCORED

Ludington Declares Pilots and Machines Should Be Rigorously Inspected

Accidents in aviation in this country could be greatly lessened if there was an adequate system of registration and inspection of both pilots and machines, according to C. T. Ludington, formerly of the Naval Air Service.

It is largely the lack of adequate interest and appreciation for the need of such laws that allows a carelessly prepared bill which passed the Senate many months ago to be now pulled away in a plenary session of the committee of the House of Representatives that has in charge.

The public knows a great deal of the state of aviation in this country, said Mr. Ludington. Now, the House of Representatives is passing a bill which will not only grow but will also be a step toward the growth of the industry.
