CEOSING UP THE CENSUS.

Our Total Population by States and Territories.

The report of the superintendent of the tenth census indicates the near completion of the important work under his charge. He estimates that five-sixths of the clerical work has been done, and the one-sixth remaining will be mostly in the line of tabulation. With the exception of obtaining the statistics of ship-building, production of petroleum, the quarrying industry and those relating to the population and resources of Alaska, the field work of the tenth census may be considered practically finished. Six agents are still employed on this work, and it is expected that within a few weeks their labors will be completed.

Rapid progress has been made during the year in the tabulation and compilation of the statistical material received, and early publication is assured.

The total population by States and Territories, as finally determined by the tenth census, is as follows:

The increase of population since 1870 appears to have been about thirty per cent. The superintendent devotes considerable space to a statement of the financial embarrassments which at one time threatened to suspend the active work of his office, and which would have made suspension an absolute necessity had not the services of a volunteer force been accepted. He assumes the responsibility for the inadequate appropriation allowed by Congress and gives the reasons for the mistaken estimates submitted.

When it became fully known that the appropriation was inadequate to complete the work to be done, the only alternative was to disband the office force and suspend all work until Congress should meet and provide the money to go on, or to accept the services of such of the old employes and officers as should volunteer to work without pay, without involving the United States in any legal obligation for their employment. To have closed the office and disbanded a force trained to the work in hand would have added largely to the expense when the resumption of labor was authorised by Congress. Valuable clerks would have found other employment. New material would have to be accepted, and the slow process of training again undertaken, while a delay of six or eight months at a most critical period of the work, when the country was impatiently waiting for results already in hand, would have been disastrous in the extreme.

After a careful consideration of the question, weighing all possible objections with the advantages presented, the suggestions of the superintendent were concurred in by the Secretary of the Interior and instructions given to permit those who desired to volunteer to do so, with a full understanding on their part that the Government had no legal right to make any contract, express or implied, that should bind it in anticipation of appropriations. At the same time assurance was given that all of the facts necessary to full understanding of the case would be laid before Congress at the earliest practicable moment. The average force employed under the conditions named has been 700. It represents the best of the old force and in point of efficiency has steadily improved upon what, at an earlier period, was considered a high standard of clerical work. So rapid and satisfactory has been the labor performed that it is confidently expected that by the time Congress meets in December the compilation of the tenth census will be substantially completed.

No one in view of the facts will question the sincerity and good faith of Gen. Walker in accepting the volunteer force to complete the important work. The course he persued was the wisest possible under the circumstances, and no stronger evidence of his unselfish devotion to the services could be afforded than the fact that out of his limited means he placed at the disposal of the Interior Department sufficient funds to meet the pressing obligations that had been incurred. The amount expended by him was about $5.000. In referring to this in his report Gen. Walker says: "Should it please Congress to make an appropriation to cover the amounts so expended, I shall be glad to be reimbursed for expenditures made in good faith and for the public's interest. If not, I shall accept the desision of that body and regard the amount so expended as my personal contribution to the success of a great public work. It is estimated that $540.000 will be required to complete the tenth census. Of this $330.000 will be applied to the payment of the volunteer force.
