

ITALIAN HOME LIFE.

SOCIAL CUSTOMS IN WHICH THERE IS A LACK OF FRESIDE JOY.

Breakfast Time—Scene at the Dinner Table—Filtration from the Window—The Son and His Sisters—A Late Supper.

(Cor. San Francisco Chronicle.)

A description of one day's life in the family of an Italian gentleman will give the reader an adequate notion of Italian home life. Our pleasant breakfast table and the family gathering thereat, presided over by the helpful mother, in her crisp white cap and elegant wrapper, are unknown in Italy. A cup of coffee, with a roll, is the only sustenance partaken of in the morning, and this taken informally at no fixed hour. The mother is not to be seen. She is either taking her coffee in bed or off to an early mass. Shade of a cavalier! can these two slatternly creatures in deshabille and clattering slippers be the graceful sylphs I admired and raved about on the promenade of yesterday evening? It is even they and they will remain in that same scant and unseemly costume until it is time to bedeck themselves for the evening passeggiata on the Corso. Meanwhile they are not idle. It is considered beneath them to do housework, but they ply the needle assiduously and knit devotedly.

The family meet for the first time at dinner, which takes place at or after noon. Before taking their seats at the table, the children (I write of a particular family of father, mother, a grown-up son, employed in the municipal office, and two daughters, also grown up, reverently kiss the hand of father and mother. But little is said, and that by the mother, who usually discourses upon one of three topics—her bodily ailments, of which she has an imaginary variety; her religion, of which she is a scrupulous devotee, and her uncle, the aristocratic bishop of Arezzo, who succumbed ages ago to the great divorcer—Death. She used to chatter considerably about her ghostly adviser, until one day her eldest-born son kicked his reverence down stairs, and is now living under double excommunication from home and church. The soup is disposed of noisily, the young ladies contributing liberally to the supplying noise, with proportionate disenchantment to depment. There are two kinds of wine on the table, baptized with water and unbaptized—this for the children, that for the parents. Toward the end of the meal the father pushes the unbaptized decanter to his son, in deference to his superiority over the girls. He drinks a bumper, lights a suicidal cigar, kisses the hand of each parent and departs for his office, when he discharges affairs of state, to-wit, the registering of marriages, births and deaths, until 5 p. m.

The old folks retire for a siesta, and the girls lecture themselves, each to her own window, whence they indulge in a half-hour's ocular flirtation with some young blood, who happens to be at a neighboring window, or whose business makes it necessary for him to pass and re-pass in the street below, until an admonitory cough from behind apprises them that the old nurse and chaperon has dined, and that "time's up." Let me remark, parenthetically, that were a young man to walk to and fro before a given house in our country, razing rapturously the white at a certain window, the probability is that he would be arrested, either as a crank or dangerous subject. But in Italy, bless you, the police remain out of sight of such goings on, as assiduously as do the "old folks" in America, when "M'riam" has her latest young man in the front parlor.

At 5 p. m. our adolescent statesman emerges from the municipal palace with the conscious dignity of a man who has labored for his country and done some business on his own account—the consideration being $20 a month, minus 13 per cent. income tax. Does he go home to read good books and "store his mind with useful knowledge"? No, for the good reason that he has no home. He eats, drinks, sleeps and has his washing done in a certain house, of which his father is the present and he himself the prospective owner. But he lives between his office and his favorite cafe, or winehouse. He may not frequent the same cafe as his father. Politics divide men socially in Italy. They are either Liberals or Clericals. No matter how small the town or village, there is a cafe and an apothecary shop, where the Liberals congregate to gossip; a cafe and apothecary shop where the Clericals meet. To one or other of these resorts, according to his political convictions and the secondary demands of his inner man, the son of the family of which I write repairs, where he refreshes himself with a cup of black coffee, or a stoup of wine, while shuffling the cards at baccarat or tri-sette. If it be winter he indulges in a harmless punch. But he never drinks to excess. At the cafe, then, or maybe at a club, or in a theatre, our friend passes his time until towards midnight. His father likewise.

Meanwhile his sisters array themselves in their best about an hour before sundown, and, with the everlasting mother, or chaperon, go out to take the air and if possible make a conquest, or establish one already begun. Going out alone is absolutely against social laws. Shopping, in the American sense, and the delight of American ladies is unknown. The mother or chaperon, does the selecting and buying. The dressmaker always works at the house of her customer and it is but recently that milliners have begun to work in their own shops. Young women have but one ambition in life, one mission, and that is to marry and be free. The being free does not amount to much, beyond the liberty of going out alone to church, or to do her own shopping. Her turning home, the ladies doff their finery and put on calico. If it be in the winter time the long tedious evening is eked out by them in alternate sewing and shivering, for even the wealthiest families have no fires. The houses are cool and pleasant in summer, but cold and dismal in winter. Even in the hotels, which have fireplaces and fires in defiance to the wants of foreigners, everything goes up the chimney but the smoke. Each lady holds in her lap a small brooze or earthen base—called a scaldus—in which there is burning charcoal and over which she warms her chilled fingers.

Extreme sanitarians decry late suppers. In healthy protestations against their rantings stand the Italians, as sound and long-lived a race as any other. Between 10 and 11 o'clock at night the father and son of our family return and supper is eaten—a substantial meal, consisting of soup, meat and salad and fruit, with wine as a necessary beverage. Tea is only used as a medicine. The supper is the pleasantest and most homelike meal of the day. The family chat is prolonged until late, and then the children kiss the lips of the parents, get their benison for the night and all retire.

THE TEETH OF IMMIGRANTS.

Investigating the Teeth of Newly-Arrived Foreigners—Interesting Results. (Utica Observer.)

The immigrant train on the Central this morning was late an hour, and consisted of one solitary car, in which were forty-seven passengers. "Come with me and take a walk through the immigrant car; I would like to show you the difference between foreign and domestic teeth." The speaker, addressing the reporter, was an old and well-known dental surgeon of this city. "I have come down here for the express purpose of noting for myself the teeth of our newly-arrived cousins," said the dentist, as he led the way to the train, which was just pulling into the yard.

In the car were Germans, English, Swedes, two Danes, and four Polish Jews. "Look at that fellow in the third seat there getting away with that bacon; see those beautiful grinders," said the knight of the forceps as he intently watched a sturdy German who, with a huge jack-knife, was cutting alternate slices of schwarz-brod and bacon which he was putting under his vest with marvelous rapidity. His teeth were indeed magnificent specimens of sound grinders, milky white, evenly grown and regularly set. Passing two seats further on we wrote a mother and two children. The woman was English, and when spoken to, displayed very beautiful ivory-like teeth. To a question of the dentist as to whether she had ever had any trouble with her teeth, she laughed and said: "No, I don't know what toothache is." Behind her was a group of several persons chatting together, and while talking they all displayed perfect teeth.

"How do you account for these people having such handsome teeth?" was asked of the dentist. After speaking of the difference between the thick and musty odor within the car and pure ozone outside, he said: "The whole difference is in the food that is eaten. These people at home were wont to eat the coarsest kind of food; they never touch sweets or delicacies of any kind, and consequently the acids which are in all fancy tidbits do not touch their teeth. Therefore, decayed teeth are something utterly unknown to them. I have not the least doubt that some of these people never saw a tooth brush. They don't think of their teeth at all, and yet they look as pearly and round as if a dentist examined them every day."

Migration of Birds.

There are rules of the road which the feathered tribes obey; some travel by night, some by day, and the latter, as a rule, are said to seek safety in their numbers and the rapidity of their flight. Rooks and jacksaws have a curious habit of varying the height at which they fly. They generally press forward on their journey, at a great elevation, till, suddenly, some among their number drop down several hundred feet with closed wings, when others follow suit, till presently the whole company has changed its level, and is pressing on at only 100 feet from the ground.

The flocks of migrating birds are usually irregular in shape, with open spaces between several batches. Swallows catch insects as they go, and a pilot bird usually precedes them. Among all the migrants the flight of storks affords the most beautiful spectacle, owing to their extraordinary powers of wing and to the gambols and aerial ballets which they practice while still advancing rapidly with each successive sweep of their strong wings. All birds of prey in large bands display the same sportive disposition on the wing.

What an Eighty-Ton Gun Cost.

In the house of commons Mr. Brand said: "One of the guns of her majesty's ship Inflexible is unserviceable in its present condition, but it is repairable. It is a muzzle-loader. It has a steel tube, with outer coils of wrought-iron. It has an enlarged powder-chamber. It was manufactured at the Royal gun factories. Its cost was 10,975 pounds sterling. It was first fired after being mounted in position on board ship, I believe in 1880. It has fired eighty-six rounds up to date. It is proposed to replace this gun by the reserve gun of the same design. There are six of these guns in use—four in the Inflexible, two in Dover turret—and beyond this there are two reserve guns. To replace the damaged gun will not cost more than 400 pounds sterling."

She Knew the Styles.

It was a very particular man that sat down to the dinner table at the Stafford house recently, and he exemplified it when he gave his order. "You may give me, Mary," he said to one of the table maids, "you may give me a delicate piece of—ah—rare roast beef, well flavored, and—ah—free from any extraneous matter in the way of—ah—stringy substance, a narrow piece of fat—the little gray—just sufficient to—ah—moisten it properly. And Mary—Mary, who had been listening attentively, here broke in: "I understand you, sir. You simply want your meat cut bias, with Charlotte Ruse flourish shirred up the back with a Pompadour rink roll on the outer edge. Do you want buttons on it?"

An Unusual Object.

Irate Purchaser—See here, sir, didn't you say this horse was gentle? Horse Dealer—Yes, sir. "You said he was used to locomotives, bicycles, horse cars, circus processions and every thing else common to city streets." "Yes, sir; I never knew him to shy at anything." "Well, I want my money back. The first time I drove him he got frightened, ran away and smashed the carriage." "You don't say so? He must have seen a most unusual object to get scared that way. What was it?" "A man with a broom."

The Camera at the Fells.

When there is much probability of repeaters getting in their peculiar work, I would suggest that arrangements be made to have a camera and a good operator at the polls to take a lightning picture of any suspected voter. It would have the effect of making some of the toughs rather slow to expose themselves to such an evidence for identification. If it afterwards appeared that there were two pictures of the same man it would be sufficient evidence for conviction.

Architectural Item.

[Texas fittings.] "Jim Smith is a cottage-built man." "What sort of a man is that?" "The man with only one story is called a cottage-built man, and Jim has only got one."

CANCER CURED. No diseases have so thoroughly baffled the skill of the medical profession as cancerous affections and as they have always been considered incurable, it has been thought reputable to adopt their treatment as a specialty; and hence physicians have neglected their proper study. But of late years new and important discoveries have brought forth a course that now proves successful in any of its forms, with certainty, without the use of the knife or caustic plasters. We have a treatment that is comparatively mild. It is not poisonous, does not interfere with the healthy flesh, can be applied to any part of the body, even the tongue. We take nothing for our services until the cancer is cured. Address
