An American Woman's Story.

It is said of the Mexicans, as of the Russians, that in repose a deep sadness is expressed in their eyes. The Mexicans are good character readers, and especially note the bearing of strangers. They are very polite and hospitable, and very proud. The higher class of society in Mexico are almost as exclusive as the court circles of Europe. A middle class is growing up in Mexico. Mexican salutations are exceedingly cordial. Men fall into each others arms and remain thus for several minutes, patting each other on the shoulder and indulging in all sorts of endearing epithets Another salutation even between friends of opposite sex is thus described: In the quickest most spirit manner, the arms of both parties are outstretch d, they rush together for a second, their breasts barely touch, and while the observer is watching for a kiss to follow this ardent salute, they separate and the abrazo is finished. The extreme frankness accompanying it compels one to admire the custom; for it means no more than hand shaking among the Americans. If friends meet twenty times a day they must pause to shake hands.

At the capital one day there was seen two splendid carriages each occupied by one man. The carriages halted, both men alighted, removed hats, -hook hands embraced talked for a few moments, again embraced. shook hands bowed, took off hats, and way. The formal salutation between Ohio and Reading by which the Baltithe left shoulder, and then a generous shake of the hand. Women who are intimate friends not only tap the shoulder, but lay their cheeks softly together for an instant. A lady had to be considered, which accounted traveler commends this sort of fem- for the presence of the heads of those inine salutation and evidently prefers roads at the conference. It was stated it greatly to the American form of last night by a prominent man in figreeting on the lips.

Americans who have married Mexican women find it nic stary to live in Mexico, for their wives are very unhappy elsewhere. Mexican children ment in schools is prohibited by law. Correction takes the form of persuasion and appeal. The result is that in all classes a gentle courtesy and consideratiion for others prevail.

Hoodlum children are unknown in Mexico. A hoodlum child is one who has been cuffed and abused until he naturally (tuat is, according to the examples set him) begins to kick and pound others who are weaker than himself. The step from this to other deeds of violence is short.

They never break into conversation but when addressed will modestly join it; then wishing to retire will sav, 'with | your kind permission and again shaking hands, move gracefully from the company. Girls are no less imbued with the same spirit of courtesy. A Mex can boy never thinks himself too near manhood to pay the compliment to his mother of kissing her hand every time he comes into her presence.
