This craft, unstayed by winds or tides, Slips out across the twilight bar; Through rosy ripples, soft she glides, Led by a single pilot star; With shadowy sails and fairy crew. She drifts along the summer blue.

She's filled from stem to stern with flowers, And Love, and Hope, and Happiness, Will aught of what she brings be ours? Ah me! if we could only guess! She rides elusive and remote,

THE MOCKING BIRD.

F ever I get safely out of this scrape trust me to never again travel an unknown region without a guide," growled Burton Everleigh as he reined in his horse and looked anxiously around. He had paused upon one of the highest peaks of the Alleghany Mountains, with the waters of the Tennessee and French Broad cut off from his observation. Attempting to follow the confused directions given by an old colored wood-chopper (as to how he would easily cross) he had wandered from the right road and was completely lost in a wilderness of foliage and rocks.

"Hum," he continued with a sarcastic smile at his own stupidity, "a pleasant prospect for a young man who loves ease, luxury and the æsthetic in life. Camping may have charms for enthusiastic lovers of nature, but I very much prefer a good hotel to lying upon the damp ground with bugs making a race track of my face, tents of my ears, and worms and snakes playfully crawling around."

"He whistled shrilly at his discomfiture. To his intense surprise the notes were answered, plainty though lowly, clearly though cautiously. Then to his greater astonishment a figure appeared to shoot up from the solid ground and pproach him.

At first he could not decide whether it was man or beast, so dim and uncertain was the little light that filtered through the trees. Then, and to his relief, he saw it was a girl, and the revolver he had drawn for defence was slid back unobserved into his pocket.

A chance flash of the sinking sun fell upon her, and his mental photograph was correct, if almost instantaneous. Her age, he decided, was under twenty years, her figure remarkable for litheness, her face for its sallow-whiteness and large eyes (the color he could not determine), as luminous as those of some feline animal. Her bonnetless head was covered with a profusion of dark, short curls, tangled and untrained and but little cared for. Her feet were bare and brown, as were hands and complexion. Her dress was fashioned without regard to taste, fitting, becomingness-to anything but the decency of life. It was of the yellow-brown homespun common in modulated and musical as to instantly find its way attractively to the ears of Everleigh when, with a sigh of relief, she said:

am glad you have come, have waited since noon for you, and my uncle will be very angry at my staying so long."

"Been waiting for me?" he repeated questioningly and in amazement.

"Yes, but I was told not to talk. Dismount. You will have to lead your horse. I will show the way." "The way? What way? Where are you going to take me?" "To those with whom you appointed a meeting."

With the spirit of adventure strong, and believing himself able to cope with any Canger that might arise, Everleigh followed his strange guide along dubious paths. But vainly he endeavored to gain any information as to where she was leading.

"You know more than I can tell," she replied when urged until she could no longer remain silent, "and it is a shame that one so young and-" she hesitated for a moment and then added, "so handsome, should engage in so dangerous and disgraceful business."

"As what?" Her lips remained sealed. He briefly related the object of his journey, insisted that she judged him wrongly and urged her to turn back and put him upon the right road to cross the mountains.

"It is too late," she answered, and he fancied the words were regretfully uttered and the pressure of her hand more warm and strong. "We have already passed two of the lookouts, though you saw them not, and I dare not go back."

"But what," he questioned a trifle anxiously, "will be my fate if I stumble upon any dangerous secrets and am looked upon as a spy?"

"Unless you can prove true the story you have told me you may never look upon home or those you love again."

"Death! And what will become of

"I know not, care not, and I would welcome death as the greatest of blessings." "Then those you live with are-" "Hush!" and she whispered impressively: "I have often thought the very rocks listened. But those I live with are only distantly related to me. The war left me without father or brother, as I had long been motherlesss. I was a mere child-was sent here for care and have found-hush! not another word, Leave your borse here. A few steps farther and you will know all, will meet

The sharp turning of a rocky point revealed a bowl-like valley, perfectly protected by high, wooded hills upon every side-a place so secreted by nature that one might long and almost hopelessly search for it. To all appearances it was uninhabited, was far from any habitation and when Everleigh first looked upon it he fancied only by wings could its depths be reached. Rude steps, Lalf nature, half art, however, eased the way. The girl traversed them rapidly, but once pausing and then to whisper in the ear of Everleigh as he questioned with regard that flashed out as from a solid ledge of rocks:

"Not a word, not a whisper. Men whose rifles never miss their aim are mountains have not keener hearing or

"A nest of robbers! And you were sent out a beautiful temptation to lead me directly into their power. May God forgive you if any harm comes to me, for my innocent blood will be upon your soul," he answered, and then the hand she pressed upon his lips stifled speech. A moment later he was surrounded by half a dozen savage looking armed men, and he who acted as leader sternly demanded:

"What brought you here?"

It needed no explanation for Everleigh to understand that they were engaged in illicit distilling; were of the worst and most revengeful class of "moonshiners." There was sufficient evidence around and he knew how desperate they were and how little they scrupled at taking life when discovered; how every stranger was looked upon as an internal revenue officer and a spy.

In as few words as possible he told his situation; that his coming was the result of accident and mistake; that he had no desire to learn anything of their secrets and regretted as much as they could his being among them.

Then the leader turned flercely upon the girl, who stood pale and trembling, and brutally cursed her for her stupidity. "I did just as I was told," she answered sullently and avoiding a blow aimed at her head. The man sprang toward her with angry face and clenched fists. But Everleign was before him, shielded the girl with his own body and exclaimed:

"For shame to strike a girl, and one innocent of any wrong." "Better look to yourself," was growled.

"When I have settled with her we will attend to you." "You will do her no harm while I live," answered the prisoner firmly, and the glittering barrel and sharp click of a revolver emphasized his words. It was a brave action, but of little avail. The men behind seized, disarmed, threw him to the ground and laughed at his unavailing struggles. He saw, however, and gladly, that the girl had escaped and was standing upon the rocks high above them. With their ever violent tempers inflamed by deep draughts of their own unlawful distilling and the appearance of a stranger, they again turned upon Everleigh and questioned him closely. His words bore the stamp of truth; he disavowed any inclidation to visit them, to learn aught of their secrets; protested against being looked upon as an official

His bold front staggered them. They hesitated about doing violence, consulted together, and his release was almost ascame to the front with "Dead men tell no tales. He has learned the way here, could guide others, would recognize us and-" "I will promise, will swear never to say a word of what I have seen and heard," interrupted the prisoner, realizing how absolutely he was in their thing when a rope is around his neck. The law is death to spies."

"That a vote must decide," said the leader, and he motioned to one of the youngest of the band.

The ballot was final, if primitive. An old straw hat, containing white and black beans, was passed around, each taking a couple. Then an empty hat received their votes-for life or against it-and the counting showed that the dark ones far outnumbered the white.

"That means death!" said the leader to Everleigh. "I am sorry, for I believe you innocent, but-"

"When am I to be butchered in cold mined to meet his fate as became a man. "Now!"

Scarcely had the murderous word been spoken before a peculiar whistle floated down on the hills. It was instantly followed by a flash of bright red flame.

"The bloodhounds of the law are upon us!" shouted the leader. "Take care of yourselves. No, no!" as rifles were pointed at the prisoner, "that will never do. Out with the fire! Out with infinitesimal part of an inch. The the torches! Let them break their necks in the darkness. We know the way. of chemically prepared sticking plaster, Silence, and every man to his home as quickly as possible."

Almost instantly upon their departure the girl was at the side of Everleigh, cut is healed and he looks on his envious away the ropes that fastened him and whispered:

"Then you is tend to leave?" "I dare not remain." "Where do you intend to go?"

"Where I shall be safe. But don't telk. Yes, I have money-have had a purpose in view for years. Careful, you are not yet out of danger." Rapidly, silently she led the way until they came to a pair of horses hidden in a thicket, Mounting, they rode swiftly away, by unfrequented road, until the light of morning revealed the valley stretching out before them, the waters of the Tennessee winding through it as a blue serpent and the houses of a city gilded with sunshine.

"Now," said the girl, "you are safe and we part. The world is wide and we shall probably never meet again. Yet sometimes think kindly of me and as one who, though unfortunate, was not lost watching, and the wild cats of the to honor and who risked her life to save vours.

He leaned toward her, flung an arm around her, drew her to him and impulsively kissed her before she could divine his purpose. She tore herself away, looked at him with flushing cheeks and flashing eyes and then madly drove her horse out of sight.

Neither business or inclination ever led Everleigh to that part of the country. His roving life, however, caused him to visit the Pacific slope. A famous singer, "The Tennessee Mocking Bird," was advertised. He went to the theatre. It was crowded almost beyond breathing. He could hear but not see the singer, but the first note thrilled him as an electric shock. He had never heard but one such voice-had never forgotten it. He watched her return to the hotel, forced himself into her presence. Indignantly she turned to confront the in-

"Do you not remember me, remember the Tennessee Mountains?" he asked stretching out his hands toward her.

"Yes, yes," she gasped, tottering to a seat, white as the laces about her throat.

Not that night, but another and another the story of each was told, and when at last he asked her to give him her heart she answered: "I cannot--cannot."

"Why?" he questioned, both in sorrow and astonishment.

"Because in the terrible night of the long ago you won it by your bravery and tenderness and with a stolen kiss you carried it away upon your lips."-New York Mercury.

A Hand-Made Fifty Dollar Bill.

A particularly bad counterfeit was detected at the Sub-Treasury, in New York City, the other day. It is the production of a pen-and-ink artist, who did his work so well that the bill passed through one of the city banks without any suspicion arising as to its genuineness. At the Sub-Treasury its character was at once discovered. The counterfeit is of a $50 greenback. The operator first photographed a genuine bill, getting a ight picture but sufficiently distinct to aid him in subsequent proceedings. Then he went over the photograph with ink, turning out a marvelously fine piece of work. The coloring is excellent, the design clearly reproduced, and the lettering far more accurate than is usually the case. The paper is good and has almost the right "feel." One or two details were neglected, but they were not of a kind to attract attention. "Act of March 3, 1863," appearing over the vignette of Franklin on the genuine bill was omitted on the counterfeit. "Engraved the locality. There was shrinking sured when one more suspicious and and printed at the Bureau of Engraving timidity in her voice—one so sweetly bloody-minded than his companions and Printing" is also mussing. Conand printed at the Bureau of Engraving sidering the time and care necessary to turn out the bill, it is doubtful if the counterfeiter profited greatly by his labors. Several years ago this same artist turned out some fifties of earlier issues than that of 1880, but most of his work has been done with twenties. The new bill is the cieverest example of his skille ver run across at the Sub-Treasury. "Humph! A man will promise any- The counterfeit was inspected by a number of bankers, and received the respectful consideration it deserved .- St. Louis Republic.

Correcting the Slant of Japanese Eyes. "The Japanese are not only adopting American social and business customs, but they are also trying to conform their physicial features to the appearance of Americans," said H. D. When complete it should be within four inches of the top of the table where the work is done. It takes up little room and is easily moved. FASTEN THE RUGS DOWN.

Rugs have nearly driven carpets out. There is a gain here in health and cleanliness, though with some disadvantages. There are rugs that will not stay in place, but insist on turning up, tripping the unwary foot and committing all kinds of mischief making which such a depraved floor covering may be guilty of. Where such is the case it is best to have sockets sunk in the floor at the corners to hold them down. Any carpet man will prepare such sockets and fasten the rug in them in such a manner as to make the fastening almost invisible. Rugs which are made up from carpeting are often very troublesome and refuse to lie in place until they are shrunk to the floor. In order to shrink such a rug it must be free from all dust. The floor must then be cleaned as clean as possible and the rug stretched and nailed firmly to the floor. When it is securely down it must be dampened thoroughly and allowed to dry on the floor .- New York Recorder.

VALUE OF LEMONADE.

Lemonade, they say nowadays, is a very healthful drink if properly made, and is good for malaria, biliousness and other attendant evils. This will be joyful news to the young people who would like nothing better than to have lemonade "on tap" all through the summer. On no account should it be made in any tin vessel as the acid of the lemon forms with the tin a poison that is very apt to produce sickness. This is the cause probably of the various cases of "lemonade poisoning" of which we hear so frequently, and which are attributed to every cause but the right one.

It is better to drink lemonade without sugar if possible; and in any event it should not be too sweet. A physician who has a great deal of experience says that a glass of lemonane without sugar before going to bed and another on rising in the morning, about half an hour before breakfast, is perferable to calomel for biliousness, and is better and more efficacious then Congress water or Hunyadi Lemons should not be eaten clear, but should always be diluted with water .-New York Tribune.

RECIPES.

Fried Chops-The French never broil chops or steaks, but always fry them in an iron pan or spider; put the pan over a quick fire; when hot lay the meat in; if there is not sufficient fat of its own to fry in, add a bit of butter.

Rumbled Eggs-Beat three eggs with two ounces of butter and a teaspoonful of cream; put into a saucepan, and keep stirring on the fire nearly five minutes, until it has risen up like little whaffles. Serve hot on buttered toast.

Preserved Rhubarb-Peel and cut up the rhubarb, boil with a very little water till reduced to a pulp; allow one pound of sugar, one ounce of sweet almonds (blanched and chopped), half a lemon cut in three slices, to every pound of pulp; boil slowly for an hour, remove the lemon peel, and put the preserves into glass cans.

Scotch Shortbread-Rub together into stiff, short paste two pounds of flour, one pound of butter and six ounces of loaf sugar. Make it into square cakes about half an inch thick; pinch them all along the edge at the top, dot over the whole surface of the cake, put them into tins so that they will just touch each other by the edges and bake in a moderate oven.

Cucumber and Tomato Salad-Slice ce-cold tomatoes; mix with them sliced cucumbers which have been peeled and stood in salted ice water. For the dressing fill a salad spoon with oil, add saltspoon of salt, mustard spoon of mustard, a little pepper. Stir with a fork. Pour over the salad and then pour over it two more large spoonfuls of oil and one of Scallops-Trim the scallops, removing the beards and black parts; stir together over the fire, butter and flour till thoroughly mixed; add to this a little finely chopped parsley, the liquor from the scallops and a little milk; let it boil up for a minute and then lay in the fish and let it heat thoroughly through without boiling; thicken the same with yolk of an egg and flavor with a few drops of lemon juice; serve in cases made of fried bread.

Roast Duck-Wipe inside and out with a damp towel. Make a stuffing ol one cupful of bread crumbs, one teaspoonful of powdered sage, one tablespoonful of butter, one teaspoonful of salt and half a teaspoonful of pepper; with it. Put in a baking-pan, cover the breasts with thin slices of fat bacon, add half a teacun il of boiling water, with a teaspoonful of salt, and bake an hour and
