A Feminine Casabianca.
The workmen of a new line of electric lights in a western city began to dig a posthole in front of a Dutchman's dwelling, when the master of the house came out and forbade them to continue the work. After a good deal of wrangling the men announced that they could not waste their time in talking, and prepared to set to work. Thereupon the Dutchman called his wife, and with a dexterous and unexpected movement succeeded in flinging over the hole the men were digging a large flat slate, upon which he established the lady.
"Now, Gretchen," he said, "dat ish where you stands till I comes back mit ein er-junction."
With many charges to his wife not to stir from that slate until his return, he departed to get the injunction which should force the workmen to cease their labors, and the stolid Dutch frau stood like a statue of immobility, her hands on her hips and defiance painted upon her face.
No sooner had the husband disappeared than the leader of the gang directed his men to take the slate with the frau on it and lift it from its place. It was a pretty severe tag, but it was accomplished, and with perfect politeness the corpulent lady was set to one side as if she had been a fat teapot on a salver.
The work of digging then went merrily forward, and while the Dutch wife held to the letter of her husband's orders with silent fidelity the men set up the tall pole. It was well in its place when the householder was seen returning in breathless haste, waving in his hand the coveted injunction.
When he came panting up and saw what had been done, he was overcome first with astonishment and then with wrath.
"Vy was you not stood on dat hole?" he demanded of his wife.
"It was on dis stone dat you vas puts me," she answered.
He looked at her in helpless indignation a moment and then cried:
"I vas not mean dat you sthand on dat stone ven dat hole vas carried away!"

Picturesque Hawaii.
The scenery of windward Hawaii is charming and picturesque in the extreme. Three huge volcanic mountains—Mauna Loa, Mauna Kea and Hualalai—rear their snowcapped domes against the sky to the height of 14,000 feet, forming a triangle toward the center of the island, their slopes clothed with dense forests of richest tropical growth, and grassy plains which trend gradually away to the blue Pacific. They are seamed with numberless ravines or "gulches," not to call them "canyons," and down each a river flows to the sea, varying in width from 100 to 2,000 feet. Many are nearly a mile wide. The waters of some, small and quiet, glide peacefully between meadowy banks to their final destination.
Others, fierce, impetuous mountain torrents, hemmed in by high, precipitous rocks, dash headlong over bowlder and precipice till they lose themselves in the dimpling ocean. Nearly all are liable to sudden and tremendous freshets. Cascades and waterfalls leap from the hills in all directions, and everywhere trees and rocks are covered with exquisite ferns and trailing parasites of all shades and kinds. The "gulches" widen out at their extremities and the sea sweeps into them with drowsy, booming music. Many a journey taken is but a continuous series of descents and ascents across these "gulches."
Thus on the road between Hilo and Lan-pahelae no fewer than sixty-five streams must be crossed in a distance of thirty miles. Having ridden for a few hundred yards along a lofty upland, the brink of a stupendous precipice is suddenly reached, a murmur of water ascends from the depths below, and in front is the equally perpendicular precipice on the other side of the tiny valley. A bird would skim across in a few seconds; poor wingless man has to trust to the unshod, sun-forefooted beast under him to scramble up and down the narrow, scarcely winding tracks cut out on the faces of the mountains.—Asiatic Quarterly.

The Railroad Refused.
"A great many years ago," said an attorney, "our road had an unnecessary damage suit brought by an exceedingly faithful and competent engineer, whose arm had been torn off by the driving wheels. It was almost a clear case against us from the start, there having been a wreck, wherein the engine was dumped into the river, the engineer thrown from his cab and drifted into the revolving wheels of his engine. I always thought the matter might have been compromised but for the brusquerie of the management. We had a great battle in the courts and were compelled to pay at last the largest amount of damages ever recovered for a similar claim—$50,000. Well, sir, after that man had received his money he came to me and said:
"See here, I don't know what to do with this money. Just you build or buy me a good home and give me a lifetime job in the roundhouse and I'll return the amount of my damages. I am a plain man, with steady, simple habits, and I would rather work for a living than be tempted into extravagance and perhaps dissipation by this money which I never earned."
"And of course you snapped him up?" said a brother attorney.
"Of course I did nothing of the kind. To have a man in our employ who could not be discharged by the company would be disastrous to discipline and a dangerous precedent. Do you see?"
"And they all saw. But an unbeliever who sat near by said to himself, "Rats!"—St. Louis Republic.

Effective Persuasion.
There had been an affray among some men and one of them was hurt. A trial took place, and an old clergyman who had seen the fight was called as a witness.
"What was Salson doing?" was the first inquiry.
"Oh, he was slashing around," replied the old man.
"Well, sir, what is that?"
"He was just knocking about him here and there."
"Now, sir, tell us plainly what did he do to this man?" asked the lawyer, with a note of vexation in his voice.
The clergyman thought a moment and then answered slowly.
"Why, he enticed him."
"Enticed him? How?"
"He enticed him with a crowbar. He used the crowbar to persuade the man, and blows he succeeded," concluded the reverend gentleman.—Exchange.

A Long Vacation.
A London schoolboy brought to his teacher a letter from a physician stating that "this boy is unfit to attend school for 304 days." The long and rather exact period named aroused the teacher's suspicions, and he discovered that the physician had written "3 or 4 days." This the boy had changed to "304 days."—Yankee Blade.
