GOVERNOR PASSES AWAY

The magnitude of the crisis that then confronted the country. When the Legislature met in extraordinary session in April, in agreed the country. capital was safe.

The foresight and energy displayed in the organization of the Penasylvania Reserves were characteristic of the whole administration of Governor Curtin, particularly upon its military side, which was really the most important side. For the position of Pennsylvania not only made its soli a battle-ground, but made its action as a commonwealth of supreme importance throughout the war, and Curtin's administration had constantly to face both the open and the covert enemies of the Union. During this time he organized and furnished to the National Government $7,000 for domestic defense. The splendid corps which was equipped at the State's expense, while Curtin was regarded at Washington as a lunatic, was eagerly accepted at last and put into the field, and Pennsylvania was left to organize new defenses against the invasion to which its position three times subjected it. In 1864 the Pennsylvania reginents called out for the special defense of the State were actually ordered into Maryland to save Hunter from destruction, almost at the very moment when McCausland was advancing against Chambersburg to destroy it. Pennsylvania, under Curtin's administration, was stall times able to defend herself, but she had also to defend the nation.

Governor Curtin devoted to the cause of the Union and its defenders not only all the energy of his mind, but all the earnest tenderness of a loving heart. He was constantly alert to supply the needs of the soldiers in the field and to mitigate the hardships of war. There was not a battle-field where Pennsylvania troops were engaged to which he did not send his messengers to care for the wounded and to bring away the bodies of the dead, to be laid in honored graves on their own soil at the cost of the State. All his influence was exerted not only for the vigorous prosecution of the war, but to assuage its horrors by justice and humanity. No State at any period of the world's history ever cared for its soldiers so tenderly as did Pennsylvania under his leadership, and that spiendid monument of enlightened civilization, the Soldiers' Orphans' Schools, was conceived and planned entirely by him.

gether from Curtin's suggestion and influence.

When his first term drew to a close, in 1863, Governor Curtin determined to retire, his health having suffered severely in the three years' strain. President Lincoln wrote him a letter offering him a mission abroad, and his withdrawai as a candidate for Governor was publicly announced. But popular sentiment, and especially the sentiment of the soldiers, would not listen to it, and when the Republican convention met, Curtin, in spite of his refusal, was unanimously renominated, and in the following October was reelected by an immense majority.

MINISTER TO RUSSIA.

The long struggle between opposing wings of the Republican party in Pennsylvania, of which Curtin and Cameron were the respective leaders, had culminated about this time in the nomination of Cameron, and Curtin did not return at once to active political life. He declined the offer of a foreign mission from President Johnson, and in 1867 was a candidate for United States Senator. He was defeated by Cameron. In the following year he was presented by the Pennsylvania delegation at Chicago as the choice of the State for Vice President on the ticket with Grant. But Pennsylvania was sufficiently sure that year, while Indiana was not, and so Colfax, of the latter State, was given the nomination. When Grant was elected he appointed Curtin Minister to Russia.

Colfax, of the latter State, was given the nomination. When Grant was elected he appointed Curtin Minister to Russia.

Governor Curtin's diplomatic service at St. Petersburg was in a high degree distinguished, and did very much to promote the traditional friendship and courtesy between the two nations. He won the warm esteem of the Emperor Alexander, and he and Mrs. Curtin well maintained the honor of the United States at the Russian court. To an old campaigner the honorable ease of such a post was a great delight, and it brought him not only rest and congenial occupation, but the restored health which he greatly needed. But the course of political events at home distressed him. The plan to nominate Grant for a third term seemed to him to endanger the very freedom for which the Republican party had fought. His sympathies were with the Liberal movement, in which so many of his former associates had embarked, and to secure liberty of political action he resigned his mission in the summer of 1872.

On his way home he was met both at Paris and London by authorized offers of either of those missions if he would remain abroad, but he declined to entertain the proposition. Though disappointed, with others, in the outcome of the Cincinnati Convention, he threw his influence in support of the movement. He was a candidate for the convention to revise the Constitution of Pennsylvania, and Ex-Governor Bigler voluntarity withdrew from the Democratic ticket to enable that party also to nominate Curtin and thus secure his election. His exceptional experience in State affairs made him one of the most useful and influential members of that remarkably able body, and many important features in our revised organic law were shaped by him.

He was now apparently out of politics, and he settled down at Bellefonte to devote himself to his various business interests. Such a man, however, could not long be allowed to remain inactive in public affairs, and in 1878 the Democrate of the Centre district nominated him for Congress. He was de

Mr. Cartin has since lived in this beautiful mountain town where he was born and where he died. His house is the most conspicuous in the place, a solid old stone mansion on the principal street, where he lived with Mrs. Curtin and their eldest daughter and their son in-law, Dr. Harris, a practicing physician of Bellefonte, and where he delighted to exercise a lavish hospitality to rich and poor alike, to the most distinguished visitor or to the most wretched tramp. He was not a man of large fortune, but he was well to do. The property left by the elder Curtin to his seven children was long kept intact by the Governor and his brothers, and though the decline of the charcoal iron industry under recent tariff legislation has compelled the disuse of the famous Bellefonte furnaces, the Governor's investments in railroads and other enterprises of his section of the State had been profitable and yielded him a comfortable in come. He maintained to the last his interest in public affairs, and it was only within a few months of his death that he ceased to take pleasure in travel, and especially in reunions of the old soldiers of the war. But though his commanding figure was as well known in Philadelphia, Washington or New York as in his native town, Bellefente was always his pride and delight, and it was there that he was really at home. He and Mrs. Curtin but recently celebrated their golden wedding. She was the daughter of William J. Wilson, of Centre county, a beautiful and accomplished woman, who was in every sense a true helpmeet throughout his brilliant career, adorning every official and social station they were jointly called upon to fill. Their second daughter, Mrs. Savage, died last year. The surviving children, beside Mrs. Harris, are Mrs. Breeze, the widow of Lieutenant Breeze, of the navy, a younger daughter who is married in the interior of New York, and one son, William W. Curtin, who married the daughter of Judge Harding, of Wilkesbarre, and resides in Philadelphia.
