BERNHARDT'S THINNESS.

Women Who Are Stout Seek Directions from Her, but Get None.

Bernhardt's slender proportions—"maigre," as she loves to call them—have been part of her stock in trade for many years. Her sisters of the stage, who, with equal euphemism, describe their superabundant curves as "ombon-point," have ridiculed her slimmness, while those more like her in figure have wondered how she kept from becoming positively bony. A reporter recently asked her:

"How do you maintain your graceful slender proportions? How do you avoid growing too thin, Mme. Bernhardt?" "I have no fear of growing too thin," replied Bernhardt, promptly. "My life is too regular for my figure to change. The reason of my slenderness is work. Every day I work so much. My habits are uniform."

"Do you diet?" "Indeed, I do not," answered the lady with emphasis. "I eat anything and everything I desire, I eat when I please and have no food fads. Fruit I am fond of. Wine I never touch."

"If you found your weight decreasing would you resort to exercise to restore it?"

"Nevaire. I do not like exercise. I take none. Walking is not good for me. I would have no time for anything else. Gymnastics are bad. Golf is an abomination. Rehearsals and the play are my only tonic."

"Do you consider that bicycle-riding has anything to do with your perfect physical condition?" "I consider that only work does anything for me. It does everything. I attribute all my success in any role to work, to indefatigable effort."

"I like to be thin. It is admirable. I never trouble about growing thinner. I always remain the same without precaution. I ride a bicycle only because it is agreeable."

"Can you suggest any means by which one may reduce flesh?"

"I cannot. I leave everything to nature. I do not believe that she can be improved upon, whatever one's condition."

Thus Mme. Bernhardt guards the secret for which fat women would give their fortunes.—Philadelphia Press.

EASILY EXPLAINED.

How Silver Would Get Into Circulation Under Free Coinage.

Many correspondents ask for information on this point, and a brief answer will be given.

Under free coinage the owner of silver bullion would take it to the mint and have it coined into dollars. With these dollars he would pay his taxes, debts and all other expenses. The persons thus receiving them would in like manner pay their debts and liabilities and meet their expenses. Thus it would make its rounds and find its way through the entire community. Not only would it at once enter into circulation, but it would have the effect of bringing a large amount of money into use that is now lying idle.

As silver floated out into the channels of trade it would raise prices and stimulate business. When prices rise money always comes from its hiding places for investment. When property is going up men will buy it, expecting to reap a profit from the rise. When prices advance—when property becomes dearer—it means that money is getting cheaper. Therefore men who have money are anxious to avoid loss converting their money which is falling, into property that is rising.

This explains why it is that in seasons of falling prices and business stagnation there always seems to be a superabundance of money. That is, a large amount of idle money for which there is no use.

When property values are falling the man with money holds on to it. He says: "If I buy now the property will shrink in value and I will lose. So I will wait until the bottom mark is reached." But as soon as it gets to the bottom he will buy, provided always that he sees a chance for an upward movement.

There is scarcely a reader of the National Bimetalists who has not acted upon this principle, and who does not act upon it every day.

Briefly and concisely stated, the principle is this: "When prices are falling it is advantageous to hold on to our money if we have any; when prices are rising it pays better to invest the money in property or other productive enterprise.

The argument (?) by the gold people that if we had free coinage the poor man would not be able to get any of the money coined presents another of their innumerable absurdities and contradictions. In one breath they insist that the poor man will be loaded down with cumbersome 50 cent dollars, and in the next that he will not be able to get any of them, even if they be coined.

It ought to be apparent that if silver bullion cannot be coined, it is utterly impossible for it to get into circulation. If it can be coined there is at least a chance for us all to get some of it. Let us take that chance.—National Bimetalist.
