fairly and fully under the evidence. We think the prisoners had a fair and impartial trial. The jury was composed of twelve intelligent citizens of good standing and of good repute. And while there was some excitement existing because of the commission of the crime, yet it was not more so than usual, when a homicide is committed in a country town or district.

We think the jury arrived at their verdict after due deliberation, free from bias or prejudice. We think under the law he verdict is sustained by the evidence. If we did not do so we would feel it our duty to grant a new trial. But after a careful consideration of the case, we discover no extenuating circumstances, in the comission of the crime, and no good reason that would warrant us setting aside the verdict.

The rule is therefore discharged and
