THE Philippine constabulary has recently been doing work which has occasioned praise from American officers in the Philippine archipelago. Constabulary participated in the recent fighting in Samar and in that on the island of Jolo. Governor Curry in reporting the fight with the Pulajanes at Magtaon, in Samar, said: "Captain Jones of the constabulary lost half of his command, gaining a magnificent victory in the face of overwhelming odds. The constabulary did splendidly, though their inferior arms, which were minus bayonets, placed them at a disadvantage." In the encounter with the Pulajanes the constabulary lost sixteen in killed, wounded and missing.

A force of forty-four constabulary participated in the battle of Mount Dajo, in Jolo. It acquitted itself well, and the loss was three men killed and one officer and thirteen enlisted men wounded. In these two battles the constabulary has come prominently into notice, but for some time it has been employed in very important work in of about 5,000 men, and they are in me quet that attracted so much attention. by a first class hotel, with this differof native soldiery. The native troops and the constabulary co-operate, but they are distinct forces. The duty of a member of the constabulary is something between that of a soldier and a police officer. At present he is pretty actively employed in ridding the Islands of the bands of outlaws, which, under various names, prey upon the natives who are peaceably disposed. The constabulary force is somewhat larger than that of the regular native troops. For purposes of administration the islands are divided into five districts, each with its commanding officer, all divisions being under the command of General Henry T. Allen, U. S. A.

The constabulary was organized in 1901. Since that time there has been a large decrease in the number of American troops in the Philippines, and the work of keeping order has fallen more and more upon the natives. In the Sulu group there are two companies of constabulary, and the American troops are garrisoned at Jolo. They are not scattered throughout the remote districts. In many places the natives see white soldiers only at long Intervals. The former are managed through the sultan and his dattos, with the co-operation of the constabulary, and when the regular American troops are employed in action it is for the bands which cannot be taken without them.

There are still many sections of the Philippine Islands which are infected by ladrones, for brigandage is an institution that has existed in the islands wiped out. The ladrones hide in moun- sion mentioned. It was a dinner with tain fastnesses and swoop down upon outlying villages or waylay the traveler. The way to fight them is to follow them to their retreats and play the game according to their code. This the constabulary has done successfully. It has rounded up some thousands of outlaws, and it is estimated that the difference between the cost of supporting the members of the constabulary and an equal number of American troops represents a saving to the government of from $10,000,000 to $12,-000,000. There are Tagalogs, Ilocanos, Visayans and Moros in the force, and they make brave fighters, especially the Moros. They love to swagger and show their weapons, and the main difficulty consists in restraining them in an encounter and preventing them
