A singular malady is decimating our chicken population and many of our citizens have lost a number of valuable fowls by it. The crop becomes congested and gets as hard as a base ball.

The victim shows signs of great suffering, droops and in a day or two dies.

Mrs. A. F. Rowan has lost, perhaps, more chickens than any of her neighbors, but to her is due the credit of having discovered a cure. You just cut an opening in the craw an inch long and with a buttonhook pick out the contents of the craw, sew up the gap with a needle and thread and there you are. The fowls so treated will walk right off and sing their little chicken song of gratitude and commence eating as if nothing had occurred. There have been quite a number of fowls saved by this process. The most singular but nevertheless true, happened in this way: The crow of one of the fowls became so congested that it burst open like a chestnut burr; the other fowls followed her around and picked out the entire contents of the crop which consisted of seeds, gravel and etc. After which the victim showed signs of great relief, rent in the craw closed and grew shut and the hen still lives.

He was a consistent christian and always took part in church affairs.
