THOMAS F. RYAN.

THOMAS F. RYAN, who figures so prominently in the New York traction inquiry, has a great reputation for tactfulness. The story is told that after he had begun to exhibit his skill in the combination of capital he met while on a visit to his old Virginia home the clergyman who had given him religious instruction in boyhood and youth. The latter remarked to him in a fatherly manner:

"Young man, I want to give you a bit of advice."

"I know what it is," returned the rising master of finance, "the same old song you preached when I was a boy, 'Do right and fear nothing.'"

"No, no; not at all, Thomas," replied the divine. "I know more of the world than I did in those days. What I intend to say is, 'Don't write and fear nothing.'"

And they say Mr. Ryan accepted the injunction and lives up to the plan of neither writing anything nor saying anything.

The newspaper man who interviews him has to do most of the talking himself. A writer in Harper's Weekly in describing the transactions with which Ryan was connected at the time of the insurance investigation said: "Searching the published records of Thomas F. Ryan through the past twenty years, as set down in the story of corporations with which he has had to do, I find up to the time when he bought the Equitable control only two occasions when he talked for publication, and the sum total of those utterances would not fill twenty lines of a newspaper. In an age of garrulity and printer's ink this is amazing, and it illuminates the character of the man."

Henry W. Denison, who was recently decorated by the mikado for services to the Japanese empire, is an American and a Vermontor, and, though he has been described as "the silent man behind the Japanese throne," he was practically unknown to the diplomats of the world until the now historic peace conference at Portsmouth. It then became known that the modest American had had a good deal to do with the direction of the foreign policy of the mikado's empire. It is said that throughout the troublesome days of the war with China he was ever at the side of Count Mutsu, then minister of foreign affairs. Denison's part in that piece of history will probably never be known. All that we know of it is that at the close of the war Denison was summoned to court to receive a handsome grant of money and the thanks of the royal family.

H. W. DENISON.

In the affair with Russia he was constantly at the side of Baron Komura, and a British diplomat was heard to declare that Denison wrote in behalf of Japan the bulk of the wonderful correspondence from Tokyo, pithy, incisive, clear and logical, that preceded the war.

The same British diplomat was authority for the statement that Denison advised the Japanese government throughout the negotiations for the first treaty of alliance with Great Britain.

Algernon Sartoris, who was recently appointed secretary of legation at Montevideo, the capital of Uruguay, is a grandson of General Ulysses S. Grant. His mother, Mrs. Nellie Grant Sartoris, was very popular in the days when her father occupied the White House, and the country naturally takes an interest in her children. Algernon's career, as it happens, has been closely associated with his love affairs. He was once engaged to Miss Edith Davidge of Washington, but that young lady feared he did not possess sufficient ambition to make some fame of his own in addition to that inherited from his distinguished family and broke off the engagement. About that time the Spanish war began, and young Sartoris served in it with credit on the staff of General Fitz-Hugh Lee. He nearly died of yellow fever. On the conclusion of the war he renewed his attentions to Miss Davidge, and that young lady took him back on condition that he would give proof of his sincerity by serious efforts to reach a still higher place on the roll of fame. He determined to go into engineering, and George Westinghouse gave him a position in his Pittsburgh shops, where he worked as a common laborer at a dollar a day, carrying his dinner pail with the rest. He was making progress in the study of electrical engineering from the ground up when illness overtook him and ended that phase of his career. The romance with Miss Dav-idge seems to have ended about that time too. He secured a commission in the regular army and rose to a captaincy, serving in the Philippines. He resigned to return to the United States, at his mother's request, about three years ago and not long after took as his bride another boyhood sweetheart, the beautiful Mlle. Cecilia Nousiardi of Paris.

The Right Rev. Dr. David H. Greer, who has been prominent in the doings of the Episcopal general convention at Richmond, Va., is one of the most unclerical looking of the members of the house of bishops. He was rector of the famous St. Bartholomew's church, New York, when chosen four years ago to be coadjutor to Bishop Henry C. Potter of the diocese of New York. Both he and Bishop Potter are excellent horsemen, and their gallops along the country roadsides help them to keep their youth, though both men are elderly, if not exactly aged. Few would take Bishop Greer for a man in his sixty-fourth year. His work for fifteen years as the rector of St. Bartholomew's resulted in making that one of the foremost of the institutional churches of the country, with a multitude of activities for the benefit of the dense population in the midst of which it is located. Like Bishop Potter, he gives away a great deal of money, sometimes as much as his salary amounts to for the year. One time when the amount of his philanthropies had equaled the amount of his salary a friend asked him why he was quite so generous. "I felt that I was getting pampered," replied the bishop, then rector of St. Bartholomew's. "I had enough left over from last year, anyway, to meet all my needs."

The bishop had preached one Sunday about frivolity. A young woman who listened to his sermon remonstrated with him.

"I, for instance, am not frivolous," she said. "On the contrary, I am fond of cooking. I often go into the kitchen and help our cook."

"But perhaps your help," said Bishop Greer, with a smile, "is like that of a young girl I used to know in Wheeling. She went into her mother's kitchen one day and told the cook she had come to help her. But the cook frowned. 'No, no,' she said. 'I have too much to do today.'"

The gyrations of United Copper stock in the Wall street curb market recall the fact that the "Copper Croesus," F. Augustus Heinze, has had, like the securities with which his name is associated, many ups and downs. But he is never down long, and the nerve he has shown in overcoming obstacles to his plans has won the admiration of a public that likes pluck wherever displayed. He holds with the United States government the unique honor of having fought the Standard Oil company and brought it to its knees. He has never shown any fear of anybody. He was the first to wear a clawhammer coat in Butte and thus won the title of "dude," but the cowboys liked him for all that and admired his nerve in going up against the traditions of a rough mining camp. One of the secrets of his success is his faithfulness to friends, and it is said that every one of the associates who in the past eighteen years have been true to him has had a share in his prosperity. When he first arrived in Butte he was nursed through typhoid by a gambler, and he has since that time staked the man on various occasions as high as $20,000. He has in his employ many men who are retained for what they have done, not because they are valuable now. If the enemy strikes he will hit back, and harder if possible, yet he must know the first blow was aimed directly at him. When asked once how much more evidence he desired of a colleague's treachery, then apparent to every one else, he replied, "Because he is treacherous is no reason why I should be."

Moritz Rosenthal, attorney for the Standard Oil company in the fight it will make against payment of the fine recently imposed by Judge Kenesaw Mountain Landis, has distinguished himself in the courts of several states. In the contest in which he is now prominent his work will be chiefly confined to the courts of Indiana, since it was the Indiana subsidiary of the national oil monopoly which was fined by Judge Landis. Attorney Rosenthal is a comparatively young man still, though he has reached a leading place in his profession. He was born in Dixon, Ill., in 1866 and twenty-two years later graduated from the University of Michigan. He was married in 1897 at Chicago to Miss Virginia Moses. He has been a member of the Chicago bar since 1890 and has served as assistant state attorney of Cook county, Ill., and as assistant United States attorney of the northern district of Illinois. He is a Democrat and a member of the famous Irquois club of the city of Chicago.

It was at once assumed that they had eloped and gone to Europe. Then came the startling statement of Arthur H. Y., under assumed names and was kept a secret because he was a student at Princeton university and wished to finish his course before announcing the marriage. Mr. Maloney called for Europe to search for the missing couple.

Traction Magnate Who Shared in Metropolitan Securities "Melon." The traction investigation in New York has again turned public attention to the Philadelphia gas and street railway magnate, Thomas H. Dolan. Mr. Dolan got his proportionate share of the now famous $965,000 check drawn by the late William C. Whitney on the Metropolitan Securities company. The task of ascertaining how and why this check was drawn and its amount distributed in the manner re-

The disappearance of Helen Maloney, daughter of Martin Maloney of Philadelphia, has been more than a nine days' wonder. Mr. Maloney, who is a multimillionaire and a papal marquis, was starting out with the party accompanying President Roosevelt on his Mississippi trip when a telegraphic message informed him of his daughter's flight from home. She had left her father's palatial summer residence lated by Anthony N. Brady has demanded the utmost acuteness and perseverance on the part of Chief Prober Ivins. In the division of the "melon" Dolan, Whitney, Thomas F. Ryan, P. A. B. Widener and the late William L. Elkins each got some odd dollars and cents over $111,000. It is a good many years back since Mr. Dolan first became associated with Elkins and Widener in traction enterprises in Philadelphia. Later the same coterie extended their operations to New York and other fields which seemed ripening for the harvest. Born in Montgomery county, Pa., in 1834, Mr. Dolan began his business career as office boy in a commission house and in time was in a position to embark on his own account in the manufacture of the articles in which his firm dealt. His operations gradually extended until they took in not only manufacturing, but shipbuilding, gasmaking and the organization of traction companies. When the reform wave struck Philadelphia at the outset of Mayor Weaver's administration Mr. Dolan and his associates and the corporations with which they were affiliated were for a time almost overwhelmed. As a manufacturer he has been noted for kindness to operatives. One day he was walking through a district in which his mills are situated with a friend, and the latter noticed that he bowed often to young women who appeared to be well dressed and sometimes even stylishly attired. "You seem to have a great many friends up here, Dolan," remarked his companion. "Who are all these ladies?" "These ladies," was the reply, with just a perceptible trace of pride in his voice, "are the operatives in my mill."

It costs a lot to be popular.

A Boston schoolboy was tall, weak and sickly.

His arms were soft and flabby. He didn't have a strong muscle in his entire body.

The physician who had attended the family for thirty years prescribed Scott's Emulsion.

HEIRESS AND YACHTSWOMAN.

The Beautiful and Rich Wife of Commodore C. Oliver Iselin.

The wife of C. Oliver Iselin, the banker, sportsman and society man, is a daughter of the late Colonel William Goddard of Newport. By his will the latter bequeathed to her $10,000,000, and it is said she will eventually come into possession of the bulk of his entire estate, valued at about $30,000,000.

AS Miss Hope Goddard Mrs. Iselin was one of the belles of the Newport set. She is the second wife of Commodore Iselin, who is known the world over as captain and owner or managing owner of yachts built to defend the America's cup. Mrs. Iselin is herself enthusiastic about yachting, always sails on the cup defenders when her husband owns the boats and at the tiller of a crack sloop or schooner is perfectly at home. She has christened a number of cup defenders.
