of the Naval academy at Anpractical completion of the group of splendid buildings for the use belief or discipline and is simply Uncle Sam has spent over $10,000,000 people. in providing suitable shelter and equipments for the young men who study at ideas in recent years much interest i-Annapolis about the art of naval warfare, and it is the general opinion that he has obtained the worth of his money. The chapel which was recent ly set apart for its sacred purpose was built at a cost of over $500,000 and was the last of the group of academy buildings to reach completion with the exception of the power plant, which is nearly finished.

It was when the country was filled with enthusiasm over the new navy and its triumphs in the Spanish war that the reconstruction of the Naval academy was begun. The plans for rebuilding on an enlarged scale had been under consideration for several years, and the actual work commenced about the beginning of 1899. The architectural scheme is the design of the noted New York architect, Ernest Flagg, and has been praised often as combining in an exceptional degree utility and convenience with structural harmony and impressiveness. The buildings are arranged in three general groups. These line three sides of the campus, and the latter is bounded on the fourth side by the Severn river. The main entrance to the academy grounds is on the side opposite to the river, and on this side are grouped the chapel, superintendent's residence and administration building, with a long line of officers' quarters forming a supplementary group. To the right of the campus is Bancroft hall, the midshipmen's quarters, a splendid building with a most imposing entrance. On the other side of the campus is the third group, chief of which are the academic building and that devoted to marine engineering. The chapel is the most elaborate structure in many respects of all those composing the Naval academy group and forms, as it were, the culminating architectural note. It is in the form of a Greek cross and has a dome which rises to a height of 210 feet. Under the chapel is a crypt, and it is here that the remains of John Paul Jones are to be placed. The chapel contains a great organ with more than 2,000 pipes, and over the altar is a window in memory of Admiral David Porter. The chapel as a whole is a memorial to the dead heroes whose names are on the roll of graduates of the academy at Annap-

Bancroft hall is six stories in height and contains 750 suits of two rooms each, thus affording living quarters for 1,500 midshipmen, more than twice as many as could be accommodated at the academy under the old conditions. It also contains a mess hall that will seat 2,000 persons, recreation room, laundries, kitchens, bakeries and other adjuncts similar to those of a big modern hotel. The building cost about $3,500,000 and is accounted without a rival of its kind in the world. The academic building contains 100 class rooms and is the largest structure in the United States devoted to scucational purposes. There are over 190 instructors at Annapolis, and the handsome structures in which they are housed form quite a village of themselves and a most interesting part o the general architectural scheme.
