People Who Get Their Names In Print—The Romance of Mayor Fred A. Busse of Chicago—Omaha's Cowboy Executive—Senator Gore's Case.

THOMAS P. GORE, the blind senator from Oklahoma, who has undergone treatment in a Washington hospital with a view to possible restoration of his sight, has a wonderful memory, and it served him in good stead when he made his filibuster speech against the Aldrich-Vreeland currency bill. Other senators who filled in time in the hope of tiring out the senate and killing the bill read long passages from books and consumed hour after hour in this fashion, but Senator Gore's blindness prevented him from reading. It did not prevent him from quoting, however, and he reeled off long extracts with which his memory had been stored just as if he had anticipated using them for such a purpose. His fellow members, sleepy as they were in the wee small hours of the night when the Oklahoma member delivered this speech, could not help being astonished by the feat he performed. They have been asking themselves what he might do if he got his sight back as a blind man he can accomplish so much. The specialists under whom the senator took treatment fear nothing can be done to restore activity in the organs of vision.

William J. Bryan, Jr., only son of the Democratic leader, is thought by many to resemble his father, and he has the latter's stalwart frame, being at eighteen a large, well developed young man. He is now a student at the Nebraska State university at Lincoln and is a well behaved young fellow, but at twelve he was as full of pranks as most boys of that age. One time when his distinguished father took him to Chicago he won fame by nearly killing himself. He was in the office of the late General Joe Wheeler in the army building and in dangling a chair castor out of a fourth story window for the annoyance of passersby on the street below lost his balance and was just falling over the sill when rescued from his peril by the gallant Confederate commander. The youth has traveled with his father in Europe and made good use of his opportunities for observation. Mr. Bryan believes in giving his children the chance to develop their inclinations. William junior had a taste for carpentry and once built a small shop on the grounds at Fairview, the Bryan home at Lincoln. Colonel Bryan, passing by, observed the sign "Positively No Admittance." He did not venture to disobey the injunction, but later asked his young hopeful why he put up the sign. "I can work better when I'm not bothered by people," was the reply. The Democratic leader decided not to "bother."

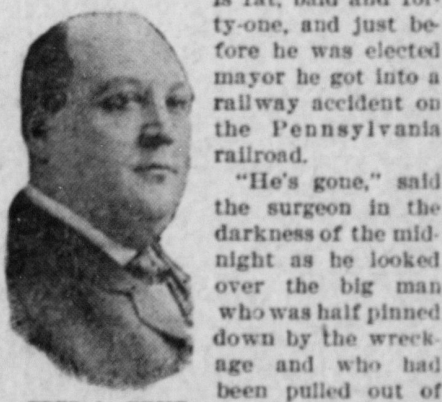

W. J. BRYAN, JR.

Chicago no longer has a bachelor mayor, for Fred A. Busse, the city's executive head, surprised his friends recently by getting married and doing so quietly that nobody knew of the ceremony until some days after the happy event. The bride was Miss Josephine Lee, and only five persons were present at the ceremony. Mayor Busse is fat, bald and forty-one, and just before he was elected mayor he got into a railway accident on the Pennsylvania railroad. "He's gone," said the surgeon in the darkness of the midnight as he looked down by the wreckage and who had been pulled out of water which was at least up to his middle. "No, I'm not gone," said Fred Busse. "I'm good for something yet."

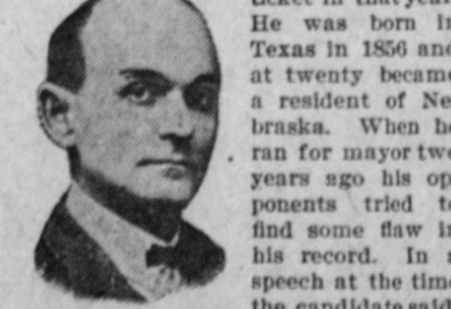

That indicates the mayor's pluck. He was postmaster of Chicago before he became mayor, and when some friends waited on him to request that he permit his name to be used for the nomination he said: "I know that while a member of the legislature, while state treasurer and as postmaster of Chicago I may have made some mistakes, but these mistakes were honest ones, and if I become mayor of Chicago I probably will make more, but they will be honest mistakes. I do not expect to set the world afire if I become mayor, but I am confident that the end of each year will show some progress in the betterment of municipal conditions in Chicago."

Senator Thomas Collier Platt of New York is fortunate in having a son, Frank H. Platt, who is versed in the law and able to advise his father in entanglements such as resulted from the senator's acquaintance with Mrs. Mae Wood. When Mrs. Wood brought her suit against the elderly New York politician, alleging that he had married her secretly at the Fifth Avenue hotel and asking for a divorce from him, Frank Platt presented evidence which convinced the court that there had been no marriage and that the representations of the plaintiff were false. The sequel to the suit was the arrest of the woman who brought it on charges of perjury and forgery. Mr. Platt is a member of a leading New York legal firm and is a director in many corporations. When his father was more active in politics than he is now he was of much assistance to him in the execution of his political plans.

FRED A. BUSSE

Omaha's "cowboy mayor," James C. Dahlman, who has recently figured in the controversy between the New York World and William J. Bryan over contributions to the Nebraska campaign fund in 1904, is a picturesque character. Mr. Dahlman, who is the Nebraska member of the Democratic national committee, has denied the charge that $20,000 was contributed to the campaign by Thomas P. Ryan in 1904 to secure Mr. Bryan's support for the Democratic ticket in that year. He was born in Texas in 1856 and at twenty became a resident of Nebraska. When he ran for mayor two years ago his opponents tried to find some flaw in his record. In a speech at the time the candidate said: "They've been out west looking up my record, and they find I have been a cowboy. You bet I was a cowboy, and I want to say here that I was a good cowboy. No steer ever came down the pike that was too big or too ugly for me to rope and tie, no horse ever came out of the corral that I couldn't ride until he was worn to a frazzle, no broncho could buck me off, and no broncho can yet, and I want to say to you people of Omaha that I am still a cowboy, and if any of your grafters and crooks come to me when I'm mayor—for I am going to be mayor—I'll rope and hog the 'em and brand 'em quicker than I ever roped and tied a steer, and that's going some."

JAMES C. DAHLMAN

It was also charged that the candidate was a little weak in his grammar. In reply to this Dahlman said: "I'll admit that I ain't very strong on grammar, but I've got horse sense. I suppose I can hire a man to write my veto messages for me and my speeches and fix 'em up nice and grammatical—I suppose I can do that, and it won't cost me much—but I want to tell you folks I'm not going to do it. Whenever a crooked ordinance comes up to me I'll take the biggest bottle of red ink I can find and the sturdiest pen, and I'll write across it, 'Nothing doing—Jim Dahlman,' and that'll be grammatical enough for you to understand."

Mayor Dahlman is now in the field for the Democratic nomination for governor of Nebraska.

At Chicago Again.

Republicans Will Gather Where Several Successful Tickets Have Been Named Before—The Convention and Its Duties.

THE name of the city of Chicago has a winning sound in Republican ears, and doubtless this had something to do with the choice of the busy city on Lake Michigan as the meeting place of the national convention of the party which opens on June 16. Lincoln was nominated there in 1860, Grant was nominated there in 1868, and Garfield in 1880 and Blaine in 1884 were named for the presidency there. Benjamin Harrison received his first nomination at Chicago in 1888. All these nominations were winning ones except that of Blaine. After 1888 the Republicans did not again meet in Chicago until 1904 when Theodore Roosevelt was nominated for the presidency and carried the country by the largest vote ever received by a presidential candidate.

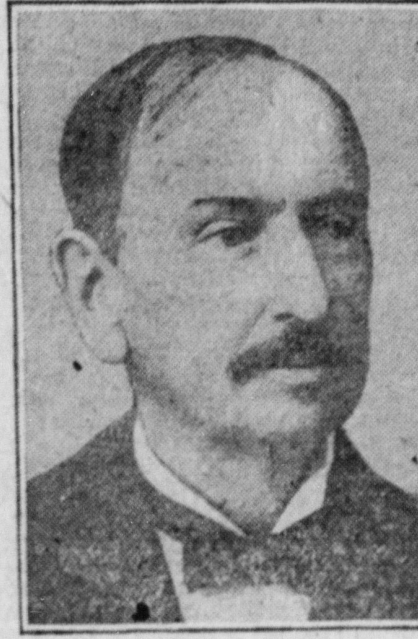

There will be 980 delegates in the Republican convention, and the man who obtains the vote of a majority of them, or 491, will be the nominee of the party for president. The Democrats have a rule making a two-third vote necessary to a choice. Delegates are chosen by congressional district conventions in the different states, and each state is entitled to send to the convention twice as many district delegates as it has representatives in congress and four delegates at large, the latter being chosen at state conventions and their number being twice that of the state's representation in the United States senate. In addition the Republicans admit to seats in the convention two delegates from each territory there being seven of these, Alaska, New Mexico, Arizona, Hawaii, Porto Rico, the Philippines and the District of Columbia. The Republican convention therefore has fourteen territorial delegates, while the Democratic convention has forty-two, as it allows six delegates to each territory. For each delegate an alternate is chosen, who take

CONGRESSMAN BURTON.

Noted Ohio Statesman Chosen to Place Taft in Nomination.

Representative Theodore E. Burton, chosen for the honor of placing Secretary Taft in nomination for the presidency, led the movement in Ohio for the latter's endorsement as the favorite son of the Buckeye State. He has been forging to the front of late among the statesmen at Washington and is looked upon as destined to wear the senatorial toga at no very distant day if a cabinet post does not in the meantime come his way. He is an author as well as statesman and is a high authority on the subject of the rivers and harbors of the United States, being chairman of the inland waterways commission, a position which brought him into much prominence during the recent conference at Washington on preservation of the nation's natural wealth. Congressman Burton is a bachelor of fifty-six and a graduate of Oberlin college. He was first chosen to congress in 1888 and has served almost continuously since. Last year he ran against Tom L. Johnson for mayor of Cleveland and was defeated. An old time observer of affairs at Washington once wrote: "Unless it be John Sharp Williams, no man in congress is the equal of Burton in stating a case. When on his legs making a speech he constantly reminds one of John G. Carlisle. Williams is richly endowed with the keenest sense of humor, whereas Burton is as serious as 'a basket of chips going to hell to be burned.'"

NEXT OREGON SENATOR.

A Republican Legislature May Elect Chamberlain, Democrat.

Should George E. Chamberlain, governor of Oregon and a Democrat, be elected to the United States senate by a Republican legislature the situation would be one for which it would be hard to find a parallel in the history of the country. Yet that is what is likely to occur as the result of the primaries recently held in the state. According to the primary law, the members of the United States senate must designate those for whom the people have voted at the primaries. The legislature will have a Republican majority, but the senatorial candidate who received the most of the people's ballots is the present Democratic governor, and it is claimed that in obedience to the law the legislature should disregard its partisan complexion and elect the plain mandate of the electors. The state of Oregon is generally classified in the Republican column. The support the governor has received, however, has broken over the usual party lines, and he is put in the same class with Governor Johnson of Minnesota, Governor Folk of Missouri and William L. Douglas, formerly governor of Massachusetts, who owed the place of the delegate in the convention in case of the latter's death or inability to attend. There will be no "booze" at the Republican convention at Chicago—that is to say, none will be served at the meeting place, according to a regulation adopted by the party's national committee. The committee cannot be held responsible, of course, for what delegates drink outside, but the convention hall itself will be "dry." The place of assemblage is the Coliseum, one of the largest halls in the world seating 10,000 people and 300 feet long by 150 wide. It was built in 1900 of steel, stone and glass, and on its site at Walnut avenue and Fifteenth street once stood the famous Libby prison, which was transported from Richmond, Va., and set up brick by brick in Chicago for the World's fair of 1903. The convention will be called to order by the chairman of the national committee, Harry S. New of Indiana and United States Senator Julius Caesar Burrows of Michigan. He will make the keynote speech of the gathering and then the convention will act on the report of the committee on permanent organization. The opening prayers on the first three days of the convention will be delivered respectively by Bishop P. J. Muldoon of Chicago, Roman Catholic; Rev. William O. Walters of Grace Episcopal church, Chicago, and Rev. John Wesley Hill of the Metropolitan temple, New York, Methodist. The general secretary will be John R. Malloy of Columbus, O., and his chief assistant will be Lafayette B. Gleason of New York.

THE COLISEUM AND SENATOR JULIUS CAESAR BURROWS, TEMPORARY CHAIRMAN OF CONVENTION.

One feature of the gathering will be a big parade of marching clubs from various parts of the country. Old time convention goers will note the absence of portraits of living Republicans from the convention hall. It was deemed necessary to put the ban on such decorations by reason of the large number of favorite sons.

THEODORE E. BURTON.

Religious Controversy. The history of Christianity is, on one side of it at least, a history of controversy. It is a history much more in structure than in pleasing. One is apt to derive from it a poor opinion of human nature, even of religious, human nature.—Christian World.
