The Campaign.

Some Names Which Figure In the Talk of the Politicians. Eben S. Draper of Massachusetts—Cleveland Letter Dispute

EBEN S. DRAPER.

EBEN S. DRAPER, the present lieutenant governor of Massachusetts, who was recently nominated by the Republicans for governor, is noted particularly for two things, his part in framing the gold standard resolution of the Republican platform of 1896 and his work in raising $200,000 for the hospital ship Bay State in the Spanish-American war. The lieutenant governor is fifty years old and is connected with several banks and industrial corporations, but is an especially important factor in one of the largest textile manufacturing in the world. This was his father's business, and after the son got his diploma from the Massachusetts Institute of Technology he donned overalls, bought a dinner pail and joined the crowd of boys who worked in the factory for a living. He remained in each department until he had learned the whole business from the bottom up. Not long since he had an appointment to meet an agent in regard to the sale of a large bill of goods. As he failed to turn up when expected, the man he was to see went in search of him and found him underneath a lathe, tinkering away on a machine which had broken down and so interested he had forgotten all about the appointment.

A man dropped in to see the manager of the press bureau at the Chicago Republican headquarters recently. "You see," he said, "I am a professional hypnotist. I have studied the art for many years, and I am confident that by means of my power I could hypnotize voters into voting for Mr. Taft. It's the best thing that has been put forward this year in the way of a novelty, and to show you what I can do I will hypnotize any one you may bring forward." "I don't see how it would be to our advantage," said the man in the press bureau. "Some of the voters might object, and suppose you couldn't get them back into their natural condition again?" "Oh, that is perfectly simple!" said the hypnotist. "They'll come back of their own accord. Bring in your man and I'll hypnotize him." "Well, I don't quite see my way clear to take the proposition up now," was the reply. "You might go over to Democratic headquarters, where they'll be likely to need you."

BROUGHTON BRANDENBURG.

Grover Cleveland bids fair to take rank as one of the historic incidents of the campaign. As the article contained an endorsement of Judge Taft, the importance of the document in the campaign was at once evident. It was sold to the Times by Broughton Brandenburg, who claimed, as a literary agent, to have offered the late president $2,000 for a series of three articles, of which the one published was the first. The others were not completed before Mr. Cleveland's death. Mr. Brandenburg is a magazine writer who has attained note for his articles on immigration. The charge that Mr. Cleveland's signature to the Times article was forged has been under investigation by District Attorney Jerome. Mr. Brandenburg claims that the question raised as to the document was the result of a conspiracy among certain Democrats who, he says, thought that the best way to offset its adverse effect on the Democratic canvass would be to cast doubt on its genuineness.

A Clever Chinaman. VI Kuyin W. Koo, member of the senior class of Columbia college and editor in chief of the Columbia Spectator, the college paper, returned to the university recently after a trip around the world in which he stopped at his home near Shanghai for a month and visited his parents. He has entered the Columbia Law school and will prepare himself to enter the diplomatic service of China. He says China is in a state of peace and that the yellow peril is a myth, as China is large enough to provide territory for a population much larger than it has at present.

The man who wastes his time seems to lose sight of the fact that he will need it all before he dies.
