HOWARD.

The weary heart hath Night for peace.

If day deny it bliss,
But where's the heart would seek release

From such a day as this ? From such a day as this?

Night gave me rest and quiet breath
Within that outer keep of Death
Where Sleep is gentle warden;
But, oh! the living jovs that thrill
Across the sunny windowsill
That looks upon my garden!

The joyance of the Spring is there:
The moist earth breathes it on the air;
And God's sweet Prophets, making
Their orisons in music, sing:
"Sleep hath no peace except it bring
A sweeter joy at waking."
May I, one night, with peaceful brow,
Pass Death, the grizzly warden.
And know the joy of life, as now
I see it in my garden. The joyance of the Spring is there,

During the past ten days the temperature has been at times somewhat lower than the very best growing conditions require, particularly affecting ripening strawberries. On Friday morning was perceptible at a few points, notably on the farm of A. M. Butler, which is prob-ably as low as any along the creek. Mr. and Mrs. Butler got up at 4 o'clock and sprinkled their succeptible garden plants with cold water, saving them from the effects of the frost. All things considered, however, the weather conditions have been exceedingly favorable to growth, and winter grains, oats and grass have done much to redeem themselves. Potatoes are doing finely, and corn, though small and lacking in color, is making a fine stand, and developing big roots which will be ready for great work when the heats of July and Aug-ust give them a chance. In short, matters at this time seem to promise a fat
