The American Ambassador, Mrs. Juliet Packer Hill

Who has recently been much in evidence in the press of the State, and whose distinguished husband, the Hon. David Jayne Hill, represents our country at the German court, is a personage of perhaps greater interest to this community than to any other in the State, excepting Williamsport, which was her birthplace, because it was the birthplace of her father, the Hon. H. B. Packer, and the home of her ancestors for two generations before him. He was born in the old Packer home—stead—the white house on the farm now owned by John M. Robb—which was built by his father, James Packer, Jr., in 1802, and was the first born of the family. He was next older than his more distinguished brother, William F. Packer, who became the fourteenth governor of Pennsylvania. He lived here until he arrived at maturity, and then went to Williamsport, where he later became Judge Packer, and made his home and reared a family of which Mrs. Hill was the seventh in number and is now the last one, all the others having passed into the beyond. Mrs. Hill's grandparents and great-grandparents are all resting in the little family cemetery on the farm on which they lived and died; and from these homes she has inherited the cultured, energetic little lady has derived many of the qualities of mind and heart which have made her distinguished among distinguished women, and furnished more of the power which has given her husband his elevated place among men, than perhaps her gentle modesty would permit her to claim.

Hard Luck for Billy Shay

Billy Shay's barber shop was rifled on Saturday night of its full equipment of razors, scissors, towels and all. Billy is a poor man, just getting fairly started in his work, and it is a more than usually low type of the petty thiefing skunk who will rob him of his means of making a living for those dependent upon him. And, as if to add to Billy's hard luck, his shop took fire, during his temporary absence about nine o'clock, and excepting for timely discovery by photographer Sprinkle and editor Dunham, the town might have suffered a serious fire. The fire originated in a bucket of old paper into which a match or stub of cigar may have been carelessly thrown, or which may have been standing too near the stove, and communicated to the painted wooden wall of the room, crept in between the inside and outside boarding where it found good draught, and thence out under the edge of the roof. A few match boards and some white paint will repair the damage.

ENTWISLE.—Mrs. Anna B. Entwisle, mother of Mrs. Frank P. Blair, of Bellefonte, died on Monday of last week at her home in Roxboro, a suburb of Philadelphia, at the age of 85 years. Virginia Women Repair Roads.

Miss Edith Thompson, of Fairfax county, believes that men have accomplished so little in building good roads and keeping them in repair that it is time for the women to take a hand. She has plunged in with enthusiasm, and with the aid of her mother and sister has improved three miles of the roughest road in Fairfax. She is joining with the men in pleading for better roads. On the theory that everyone should help, she does not exempt her own sex. Her example, she believes, will stir up the men who are fluent in their talk but slow to work for good roads. Miss Thompson seems to have stood well the rough work of wielding pick and shovel. "The men say they are busy when it is time to mend the roads, she argues, "but the women find time to do the work if the women threaten to do it."

The first day of the hunting season proved to be of account to several of the Centre Hall hunters. The first to return home was Rev. D. Gress, who bagged during the first few hours of the season, his full day's allowance of gray squirrels. S. E. Sharrer returned with a wild turkey as did also John A. Korman and Grover Weaver. George Shearer killed a turkey, Gardner Grove, of near Penn Cave, killed a turkey. A pheasant was captured by John Knarr and two gray squirrels by Ted Bailey.

PORT MATILDA.

Quite a number of the farmers in our vicinity have finished husking their corn and find a much better yield than expected of good, solid corn.

Hunting season opened up lively, with good results, as some kinds of game are plentiful.

The recent rainfall did much towards urging the growth of the fall crops which look promising at this writing.

A few days ago a husking bee was held on the farm of Joseph Cowher. Notwithstanding the limited turnout of help they husked about 900 bushels of corn.

Mrs. Margaret Sharer, who has been quite ill for some time past, is recovering slowly, and to brighten her pathway in life some of her youthful friends, a few evenings since, gathered around her fireside and rendered some fine selections of vocal music, which she highly appreciated.

Sylvester Cowher and his brother, Levi, of Sandy Ridge, were recent visitors at the home of their father, Joseph Cowher, near Old Orchard.

Miss Florence Rhodes, who for some time past has been staying with her aunt in Tyroce, has returned to her home in this place.

Rev. Harry McKelvie has been appointed by the U. B. conference as spiritual adviser on the Port Matilda charge. Rev. McKelvie is well and favorably known in this community and will do good work.

William and Harrison Rhoades, of Pleasant Hill, have embarked for the Blair county coal mines near Retort, where they will engage in mining coal.

J. M. Williams, who has for some time been an inmate in White Haven sanitarium for medical treatment, visited his family in this place recently and returned to the sanitarium feeling but little benefited.
