REBERSBURG.

W. J. Kreider is remodeling the oldest brick house in Rebersburg which was built more than seven decades ago and was owned by John Burket, who was one of three prosperous brothers of that period, the others being Frederick and Jacob. The brick work is intact and solid, whilst the woodwork only needs repainting.

Register Frank Smith, of Bellefonte, was a visitor of Hon. Henry Meyer and others last week.

The price of beef has gone up and the butchers complain that they cannot buy cattle, because of the demand in the cities for veal and the scarcity of feed. Animal industry in Pennsylvania is a paying proposition.

John F. Potter, Esq., of Philadelphia, is the guest of Howard Krape. When Howard Krape came to dig up his "Old Bull" fiddle, he discovered that the Norway rats, or something, had purloined parts of it.

The gnatty weather indicator is the latest. Dan Royer observes that the gnats swarm persistently just before a rainy spell.

Hon. Henry Meyer, who lost an arm in battle, declares that a bayonet charge usually results in one or the other side running away, and bayonets were chiefly used for sticking flags for forming parties and pinning down soldiers' tents.

The coming event at Gettysburg on July 1st, will be the greatest since the Blue and the Gray met there in a titanic death grapple July 1, 1863. The arrangements, contemplating a "tenting on the old camp ground," embrace provisions for survivors of both Federal and Confederate armies, but only actual veterans will be supplied with tents and rations.

July 1, next it will be fifty years since we heard the thunder of artillery in Pennsylvania. The turning point of the war to sever the Union in two, was then imminent. Many Pennsylvanians came up in the van under Reynolds and were soon in deadly action, declaring: "We have come here to stay." How many there were who fell, is inscribed upon the regimental monuments. Only one state, New York, suffered heavier losses in the battle. The first day was fought by Reynolds' corps (the first) singly, against more than half the army of Lee, under Hill and Early. The battle was not contemplated by either Meade or Lee, but was precipitated by Hill whose sole purpose in going to Gettysburg was to supply his corps with shoes. Early had gone on to Carlisle with the purpose of capturing Harrisburg and Gov. Andy Curtin, whilst Ewell had pushed on to York to collect money from that rich Dutch city. But when the roar of artillery was heard, Early hastened back to Gettysburg and arrived in time to double up the Federal army, whose commander had fallen in the skirt of woods west of the Lutheran theological seminary. Neither Meade or Lee was on the battle field July 1st, but both arrived during the night, Meade establishing his headquarters in a house on the Baltimore Pike south of Gettysburg near the cemetery and Lee pitching his headquarters tent in the McPherson apple orchard west of the first Union line, where the firing had decimated the apple trees. The Gettysburg "guide" will point out the old stone house north of the Chambersburg road, near the Seminary, as Lee's headquarters, but this is pure fiction. That house was the center of the opposing lines and was turned into a hospital, as related by one of the occupants at the time, to your correspondent. The second night Lee's tent was pitched in the grove right back of the Seminary and he used the cupola of the Seminary as an observatory. At that time he was in the old stone house was to visit some of his wounded officers who were receiving surgical treatment in it as a hospital.

Too bad!

We had quite a scare in our little town last week, when a mad dog ran through the streets and sped down the road toward Wm. Risher's farm. At Harry Ream's it ran into the yard and biting onto a roan wash it pulled it out of the ground. Then it continued its mad flight down the road, barking and biting at the fences. When it reached Frank Lee's farm it ran over an implement shed where it was finally shot by Harry Risher and Harry Ream who had followed it in an auto.
