Diagnose Tuberculosis Early

The innocuous tuberculin test should be given to all school children. If the child reacts to the test positively, he should have the lung X-rayed and have a physical examination, which includes a laboratory examination of the sputum. Many children have a childhood type of tuberculosis without manifesting any symptoms that can be ascribed to the disease, which if left untreated may advance to the adult form with all its hydra headed symptoms. It is important therefore that all school children, even if well nourished and healthy in appearance, should be given the tuberculin test.

This simple and comparatively inexpensive procedure for testing school children for tuberculosis should be instituted in every school in the country. A child will often react to this test, when physical examination fails to reveal a single symptom of the disease. If these undiagnosed tubercular children are allowed to go on mingling freely with other children they not only spread the disease among their associates but as a rule break down in high school or college, with an advanced type of the trouble. Their hopes are blasted, ambitions that had been beckoning them on down the road of achievement must wither and fade during the years of their suffering, heart break, when the poor sufferer sees all his bright dreams fading and falling like the leaves of autumn before the wintry blast.

The people need to be educated concerning tuberculosis. Many who are really intelligent seem to have a great deal of misinformation on the subject. They still believe that the disease is hereditary. It is not. A child may become infected from a tubercular mother or from a nurse or any other person with whom he is in constant contact. Every case of tuberculosis should if possible be traced to its source. When a member of a family is found to be suffering from the disease, every one in the group should be placed under observation and examined for tubercula.

A healthy person can usually throw off a slight infection but when he is constantly being infected from a contact, he is apt to become overwhelmed by the infection, which breaks down the resistance of the body, and allows the disease to become well established. Frequently no attention is paid to it, until the disease is so advanced that even a layman can diagnose it. In the meantime the germs are spreading from one to another until perhaps a large number of people have fallen victims of this dread malady. If we ever succeed in stamping out tuberculosis it must be attacked vigorously. Children should all be diagnosed, when found infected, not only should they be treated but the source of their infection should be discovered and every means used to so instruct and care for those who have been spreading the infection that they will no longer be dangerous to others.
