POOR CARE IS CAUSE OF FLOCK EGG SLUMP

There are many reasons for slumps in egg production, according to County Agent R. C. Blaney. Poor management is one of the chief reasons.
Irregular feeding and lack of a constant supply of drinking water, and sudden changes in rations are management factors causing egg laying slumps. Irregular use of light affects the bird's regular routine of feeding, drinking, and laying. Sudden changes in rations affect the palatability or appearance of the feed. Sometimes the birds may eat an excess of new feeds to which their systems are not adjusted.
Fright may cause layers to molt and they usually cease production while growing new feathers.
Insufficient feed intake may be responsible for a loss in body weight since the birds are not getting sufficient nutrients to maintain life and build up eggs. A shortage of hopper space may keep down feed consumption, especially in mash and oyster shells. Have at least 10 to 12 linear feet of mash hopper space per 100 hens.
Some flocks lay temporarily of specific grains like corn or wheat. If corn is refused, more wheat, oats, barley or buckwheat can be fed until the hens get back their appetites for corn. The same principle applies to the other grains.
Changing layers to different pens or houses, as well as changes in caretakers, may affect their regular routine of living and cause slumps. One of the quickest ways to curtail production is to take water away from a heavy laying flock for a day or let the water freeze.

HOLDING COMPANIES CAN EXERT VARIED INFLUENCES

The President is taking pot-shots at holding companies, and the holding companies are firing back. People are talking about financial pyramids and what not, without going very deeply into what these things are.
Well, what is a holding company? Technically, it is a corporation in a position to control or influence other corporate structures through ownership of securities in those structures.
The primary activity of a holding company is to pump capital and efficiency into the smaller, operating units it controls. Operating companies often welcome holding company control because powerful financial groups can issue and sell the public securities that never could be marketed by an isolated company. This is what the holding company, like Topy, did—grew—and became a peculiarly American financial device to put capital to work to market natural resources and services.
At the same time, the parent, or top holding corporation can compel its children to adopt efficient methods and put out a uniform product.
But, the holding company device has grown so popular that promoters have been tempted by the possibility of pyramiding profits. Some holding companies have slipped water into their stock issues so they piled one parent company on another, and some have forced operating corporations to pay enormous fees for "services" or have even borrowed money from them.
The number of financial times it is possible to play on the holding company game, in fact, is about as great as the flood coming from Tin Pan Alley.
The holding company made possible such top-heavy financial empires as the Inaull utility group, which crashed in 1929 with losses to thousands of investors, many of whom did not even understand what kind of securities they had bought.
It has also led to some congressional interference with the holding company device. The present law provides that utilities must form their holding companies only
