Detachable Collars

When one has a separate white collar on a dress, the trouble of sewing it on after each laundering will be eliminated if snap fasteners are placed on the inside of the collar and at the neck edge.

Bleaching Linens

One of the easiest methods of bleaching linen is by freezing. Thoroughly wet the yellowed handkerchiefs, napkins, and other linen articles, and hang them out until they have become stiff. They will come in beautifully white and fresh and sweet.

Two County Men In Legal Battle

Sen. E. J. Thompson, Attorney W. T. Litke in Center of Oil Commission Controversy

Two prominent Centre County men are in the center of a legal battle that threatens to develop nationwide complications, it became known here this week with the announcement of the latest moves being taken by the State Commission to Investigate the Lubricating Oil and Gasoline Business in this Commonwealth. The two local men who are embroiled in the controversy are William T. Litke, of Bellefonte, who is counsel for the State Commission, and Senator Edward Jackson Thompson, of Philipsburg, a member of the law firm of Fleming and Litke, of Bellefonte. In order to obtain a fair view of the present legal snarl which is temporarily holding up the work of the Commission, it is necessary to review the history of that body since its establishment by an act of the legislature on April 29, 1937.

The Commission was created and given authority to conduct a thorough and impartial investigation into the operations of the oil industry in Pennsylvania. Members named to the investigating body were: Judge Ralph H. Smith, of Philadelphia; State Representative Michael C. Chervak, Jr., of Cambria County, and John E. McComb, Venango County oil producer.

To begin their work, the Commission several weeks ago sent out questionnaires to representatives of Pennsylvania's 22 major oil companies, together with hundreds of others involved in the industry. These questionnaires were designed to bring out the real facts in the business of the oil industry, its relations with other companies, the handling of stock, securities and salaries, and the position of each company on the problems of "hot oil" and Government regulations. The Commission, under the act of the Legislature, has the power to subpoena witnesses and compel them to bring records and accounts showing various business operations. Judge Hagedorn, sitting as the Commission subpoenaed E. M. O'Callahan and the Petrol Corporation, of Philadelphia, asking them to produce records, contracts, agreements, and profit and loss statements for 1936 and 1937 at a hearing which was to have been held by the Commission in Philadelphia on February 1.

On January 27, however, O'Callahan and the Petrol Corporation in the Dauphin County Court secured a preliminary injunction enjoining the Commission from holding any further investigation or hearing, contending that the act creating the Commission, and the activities of the Commission are unconstitutional.

At the hearing, Judge Hagedorn granted the preliminary injunction. On January 27, Litke as counsel for the Commission, went to Harrisburg and filed a petition asking the court to appear specially and move that the injunction be dissolved. Judge Wickham allowed that petition and set February 7, 1936 as the time for a hearing in that matter. At the Monday, Feb. 7, hearing Litke presented a petition to dissolve the injunction and will uphold his position by citing 12 reasons. Among these reasons Mr. Litke will cite the fact that the Commission was given no prior notice that an injunction would be sought; that the petition failed to meet the requirements of equity rules as approved by the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania; that the defendants (members of the Commission) are not residents of Dauphin County, and that Dauphin County therefore has no jurisdiction over them or over the subject matter, and finally, that the petition failed to state the requirements of equity rules as approved by the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania; that the defendants (members of the Commission) are not residents of Dauphin County, and that Dauphin County therefore has no jurisdiction over them or over the subject matter, and finally, that the petition failed to state the requirements of equity rules as approved by the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania.

Meanwhile the subpoena served on the complainants has been withdrawn but the Commission can issue a new one at any time. In an interview yesterday Mr. Litke declared that the Commission is determined to resist interference with its powers, and if necessary will carry the fight to the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania. The Commission considers itself as an arm of the Legislature, and expects to tolerate no interference with its assigned duty of fact finding. Wisconsin Decision. Behind all this legal jockeying, it was revealed, lie two highly significant factors:

1. The recent Wisconsin oil decision has centered attention again on charges made before the commission that the industry is ridden with price wars, price-fixing, unfair trade practices and a general lack of stability. 2. It is understood the commission is making exhaustive chemical analysis to find out if there is any essential difference in all the various brands of gasoline now in such furious competition.

While members of the commission refuse to discuss the latter move, it is regarded as the most significant angle of the inquiry. There have been intimations that the results may be sensational and may have a wide effect on the conduct of the entire gasoline industry. These tests were decided on, it was said, after testimony was given to the commission in western Pennsylvania indicating that the storage plant of one big company was supplying gasoline for half a dozen different companies in that area. Representatives of the companies testified that where this is the case the gasoline for the various companies is made to "specifications." The Commission wants to know, scientifically, what these specifications are and what fundamental difference there may be in the various brands.

National Proportions

This line of inquiry assumes national proportions was well illustrated by a remark made by one person close to the commission. Asked if the inquiry would extend beyond the State lines, he answered: "The difficulty is to keep it within the United States." The oil industry investment in the United States was over $14,000,000,000 in 1937. Production of oil in Pennsylvania—mostly high-grade lubricating oil—extends over 18

Measles Death - Mostly Infants

Disease is More Dangerous to Children Under Five Years of Age

Measles cause 10,000 deaths in the United States each year. More than 90 per cent of these deaths, according to Dr. Paul A. Kenney, staff member of the Pennsylvania Department of Health, occur with children under five years of age. "There is an old saying," observes Dr. Kenney, "that since all children sooner or later develop measles, one might just as well expose them to the disease while they are young and get it over with." "This hardly seems a sound theory in view of this high mortality rate for the disease among the preschool age children."

"Certainly it would be sounder reasoning for parents to do everything in their power to protect children from the disease, especially those of more tender years." Dr. Kenney pointed out that measles is a highly contagious disease and it is a public duty to enforce every means of protection when the disease is prevalent. "It can be carried by a person who enters the same room with a measles patient to other susceptibles in the building," he said, "but it is seldom, if ever, carried by such a person to one outside. This is because the causative agent does not seem to withstand the outside air."

Dr. Kenney reminds that the disease is generally most contagious in the day and a half before the rash appears, during the period when the child or adult seems to have a cold in the head, sneezes, has a nose discharge, watery eyes, with red and perhaps swollen, sometimes a cough and a slight fever. "At a time when measles is prevalent, a mother, who is a good citizen, and who considers the welfare of the children of the neighborhood will at least isolate a child with any of the symptoms until it is definitely known whether the condition is 'just a cold in the head' or the beginning of measles," he explains. Surveys of the more crowded sections of this country show that probably 95 per cent of all persons reaching maturity have had measles, therefore, there is only five per cent of the adult population likely to contract the disease. "Bearing in mind the high mortality rate of the disease, and that many thousands carry the results of an attack of measles throughout life, it is easy to understand that measles may be the straw that breaks the camel's back when illness strikes during later life."

Your Health

Except in a very few instances, we are born with perfect feet. At birth there are no connecting bones in the feet. The bony masses, which later develop into the bony structure, do not even approximate each other.

Not until about the age of 12 is this bony structure near full growth. Complete development does not come until about the eighteenth year. On the soles of the feet of the infant nature provides a padding of fatty tissue which gives to the foot an appearance of flatness. As the child begins to stand, the muscles of the foot develop and this fatty tissue is absorbed. When this absorption takes place the sole of the foot takes on an arched appearance.

During this period of bone formation and arch development the greatest care must be exercised. If there is no sickness, overweight, undernourishment, mechanical interference, or injuries, development will come naturally. The feet are composed of many small bones—52 in all. This comprises one-fourth of all the bones in the body. These many small bones are easily forced into abnormal positions. Congenital foot defects are rare—acquired defects are common.

It has been estimated that from 70 to 90 per cent of school children of varying ages have more or less foot-impairment, with an alarming number of foot defects. Most of the minor and major foot abnormalities are directly traceable to improperly fitted shoes, increases in weight, illness or occupational difficulties, especially where one is constantly on the feet.

Any one or combination of these, will force the bones in the feet to change their normal position. Resulting in pains, aches, burning sensations and severe cramps. Pain is often conducted to the knees, thighs and lower part of the back from the feet. People think they have rheumatism, or more specifically, arthritis or neuritis. In many cases the cause of this disorder is found in the feet. Greater care should be exercised in fitting shoes.

DO YOU KNOW The American medical profession has not been static in relationship to the problems of medical care to all. It has undertaken new experiments in medical care in many communities. In Pennsylvania, in nearly a score of counties, plans for the medical care of the indigent, under the new Public Assistance Act, are being worked out between the county medical society and the county commissioners which are satisfactory to all and enable the doctor to remain loyal to the ideals of his profession.

Cleaning with Gasoline After one has cleaned a fabric with gasoline, put about one-third part vinegar into the water with which the cloth is dampened before ironing. This will prevent circles from forming and also remove the scent of gasoline.

The Linen Closet A coat of blue enamel paint on the shelves of the linen closet will not only make the closet more attractive, but will keep the linens a good color.
