has changed considerably during when a girl got along in her twenties and remained unmarried, the neighbors began to call her an old maid. In those days the only career for a woman was that of wife or mother and if she remained single and had no private income she became an extra burden for the male relatives. Therefore, it was very necessary to everybody's peace of mind for the girls to get married even though they failed to find Mr. Right.

But times have changed, for be very thankful. No longer is it her time and for two reasons:

the privacy of their own little apartment, the right to choose their own companions and the ability to handle their own money as they please, in preference to matrimony. I know plenty of single women who could have gotten married a half dozen times but who preferred their single state to the men they might have married. So just because a woman is unwed is no sign that she couldn't have gotten married if she had wanted to.

Now, as to what makes an old maid-I think the answer to that is a woman's state of mind The which I am sure all women should term, "old maid," is associated with prim, prissy, narrow-minded people. necessary for a girl to grab a good I have seen old maids at twenty and chance before she arrives at the some of them were married.
